8. We may have in this conflict of the orthodox divinities and heretical Daityas some covert allusion to political troubles, growing out of religious differences and the final predominance of Brahmanism. Such occurrences seem to have preceded the invasions of India by the Mohammedans and prepared the way for their victories.

9. There is a play upon the word Bali, which means 'tribute', or 'fragments of a meal scattered abroad to the birds'.

10. The legend is peculiar to the Viṣṇu Purāṇa, although the doctrine it inculcates is to be found elsewhere.

11. Haitukas, 'causalists'; either the followers of the Nyāya or 'logical' philosophy or Bauddhas, those who take nothing upon authority and admit nothing that cannot be proved; or it is explained, those who by argument cast a doubt upon the efficacy of acts of devotion.

Maitreya said–Venerable preceptor, you have explained to me the perpetual and occasional ceremonies which are to be performed by those righteous individuals who are diligent in their devotions; and you have also described to me the duties which devolve upon the several castes and on the different orders of the human race. I have now to request you will relate to me the dynasties of the kings who have ruled over the earth.[1]

Parāśara replied–I will repeat to you, Maitreya, an account of the family of Manu, commencing with Brahmā and graced by a number of religious, magnanimous and heroic princes. Of which it is said, "The lineage of him shall never be extinct, who daily calls to mind the race of Manu, originating with Brahmā."[2]

Listen therefore, Maitreya, to the entire series of the princes of this family, by which all sin shall be effaced. Before the evolution of the mundane egg, existed Brahmā, who was Hiraṇyagarbha, the form of that supreme Brahma which consist of Viṣṇu as identical with the Ṛk, Yajur and Sāma Vedas; the primeval, uncreated cause of all worlds. From the right thumb of Brahmā was born the patriarch Dakṣa;[3] his daughter was Aditi, who was the mother of the sun. The Manu Vaivasvata was the son of the celestial luminary; and his sons were Ikṣvāku, Nṛga, Dhṛṣṭā, Śaryāti, Nariṣyanta, Prānśu, Nābhāga, Nediṣṭa, Karūṣa and Pṛṣadhra.[4] Before their birth, the Manu being desirous of sons, offered a sacrifice for that purpose to Mitra and Varuṇa; but the rite being deranged, through an irregularity of the ministering priest, a daughter Ilā, was produced.[5] Through the favour of the two divinities, however, her sex was changed and she became a man, named Sudyumna. At a subsequent period, in consequence of becoming subject to the effects of a malediction once pronounced by Śiva, Sudyumna was again transformed to a woman in the vicinity of the hermitage of Budha, the son of the deity of the moon. Budha saw and espoused her and had by her a son named Purūravas. After his birth, the illustrious Ṛṣis, desirous of restoring Sudyumna to his sex, prayed to the mighty Viṣṇu, who is the essence of the four Vedas, of mind, of everything and of nothing; and who is in the form of the sacrificial male; and through his favour Ilā once more became Sudyumna, in which character he had three sons, Utkala, Gaya and Vinata.[6]

In consequence of his having been formerly a female, Sudyumna was excluded from any share in his paternal dominions; but his father, at the suggestion of Vasiṣṭha, bestowed upon him the city Pratiṣṭhāna[7] and he gave it to Purūravas. Of the other sons of the Manu, Pṛṣadhra, in consequence of the crime of killing a cow, was degraded to the condition of a Śūdra.[8]

From Karūṣa descended the mighty warriors termed Kārūṣas (the sovereigns of the north).[9] The son of Nediṣṭha, named Nābhāga, became a Vaiśya;[10] his son was Bhalandana;[11] whose son was the celebrated Vataspri[12]; Prānsu; whose son was Prajāni;[13] whose son was Khanitra;[14] whose son was the very valiant Cakṣupa;[15] whose son was Viṁśa;[16] whose son was Viviṁśati;[17] whose son was Khaninetra; whose son was the powerful, wealthy and valiant Karandhama;[18] whose son was Avikṣi (or Avikṣit)[19]; whose son was the mighty Marutta, of whom this well known verse is recited; "There never was beheld on earth a sacrifice equal to the sacrifice of Marutta: al the implements and utensils were made of gold. Indra was intoxicated with the libations of Soma juice and the Brāhmaṇas were enraptured with the magnificent donations they received. The winds of heaven encompassed the rite as guards and the assembled gods attended to behold it."[20] Marutta was a Cakravarttī or universal monarch : he had a son named Nariṣyanta;[21] his son was Dama;[22] his son was Rājyavardhana; his son was Sudhṛti; his son was Nara; his son was Kevala; his son was

Bandhumat; his son was Vegavat; his son was Budha;[23] his son was Tṛṇavindu, who had a daughter named Ilavilā.[24] The celestial nymph Alambuṣā becoming enamoured of Tṛṇavindu, bore him a son named Viśāla, by whom the city Vaiśālī was founded.[25] The son of the first king of Vaiśālī was Hemacandra; his son was Sucandra; his son was Dhūmrāśva; his son was Sṛñjaya;[26] his son was Sahadeva;[27] his son was Kriśāśva; his son was Somadatta, who celebrated ten times the sacrifice of a horse; his son was Janamejaya; and his son was Sumati.[28]

These were the king of Vaiśālī; of whom it is said, "By the favour of Tṛṇavindu all the monarchs of Vaiśālī; were long lived, magnanimous, equitable and valiant."

तावच्च त्रिमार्गपरिवर्त्तैरनेकयुगपरिवृत्ति तिष्ठन्नपि रैवतकः शृण्वन् मुहूर्त्तमिव मेने॥ २१॥

Śaryāti, the fourth son of the Manu, had a daughter named Sukanyā, who was married to the holy sage Cyavana;[29] he had also a righteous son, Called Ānartta. The son of the latter was Revata,[30] who ruled over the country called after his father Ānartta and dwelt at the capital denominated Kuśasthalī.[31] The son of this prince was Raivata or Kakudmīn, the eldest of a hundred brethren. He had a very lovely daughter and not finding any one worthy of her hand, he repaired with her to the region of Brahmā to consult the god where a fit bridegroom was to be met with. When he arrived, the quiristers Hāhā, Hūhū and others, were singing before Brahmā and Raivata, waiting till they had finished, imagined the ages that elapsed during their performance to be but as a moment.

गीतावसाने भगवन्तमब्जयोनिं प्रणम्य रैवतकः कन्यायोग्यं वरमपृच्छत्। तञ्चाह भगवान्, कथय योऽभिमतस्ते वर इति। पुनश्च प्रणम्य भगवते यथाभिमतानात्मनः स वरान् कथयामास, क एषां भगवतोऽभिमतः? कस्मै कन्यामिमां प्रयच्छामीति। ततः किञ्चिदवनतशिराः सस्मितो भगवान् अब्जयोनिराह॥ २२॥

At the end of their singing, Raivata prostrated himself before Brahmā and explained his errand, "Whom should you wish for a son-in-law?" demanded Brahmā; and the king mentioned to him various persons with whom he could be well pleased. Nodding his head gently and graciously smiling, Brahmā said to him,

ये एते भगवतोऽभिमताः नैतेषां साम्प्रतमपत्यापत्य-सन्ततिरप्यवनीतलेऽस्ति। बहूनि हि तवात्रैतद् गान्धर्वं शृण्वतश्चतुर्युगा यतीतानि। साम्प्रतं भूतलेऽष्टाविंशतितमस्य मनोश्चतुर्युगमतीतप्रायम्, आसन्नो हि तत्कलिः। अन्यस्मै कन्यारत्नमिदं भवतैकाकिना देयम्॥ २३॥

भवतोऽपि मित्र-मन्त्रि-भृत्य-कलत्र-बन्धु-बल-कोषादयः कालेनैतेनात्यन्तमतीताः॥ २४॥

"Of those whom you have named the third or fourth generation non longer survives, for many successions of ages have passed away while you were listening to our songsters; now upon earth the twenty-eighth great age of the present Manu is nearly finished and the Kali period is at hand. You must therefore, bestow this virgin gem upon some other husband, for you are now alone and your friends, your ministers servants, wife, kinsmen, armies and treasures, have long since swept away by the hand of time."

पुनरप्युत्पन्नसाध्वसः स राजा भगवन्तं प्रणम्य पप्रच्छ, भगवन्! एवमवस्थिते ममेयं कस्मै देयेति। ततः स भगवान् किञ्चिदवनतकन्धरं कृताञ्जलिभूतं सप्तलोकगुरुरब्जयोनि-राह॥ २५॥

Overcome with astonishment and alarm, the Rājā then said to Brahmā, "Since I am thus circumstanced, do you, lord, tell me unto whom the maiden shall be given:" and the creator of the world, whose throne is the lotus, thus benignantly replied to the prince, as he stood bowed and humble before him :

"The being of whose commencement, course and termination, we are ignorant; the unborn and omnipresent essence of all things, he whose real and infinite nature and essence we do not know–is the supreme Viṣṇu.

Through the favour of that imperishable being am I the agent of his power in creation : through his anger is Rudra the destroyer of the world; and the cause of preservation, Puruṣa, proceeds also from him.

That city Kuśasthalī which was formerly your capital and rivalled the city of the immortals, is now known as Dvāraka[32] and there reigns a portion of that divine being in the person of Baladeva; to him, who appears as a man, present her as a wife; he is a worthy bridegroom for this excellent damsel and she is a suitable bride for him.

Repairing to the city of Kuśathalī, which he found much altered, the wise monarch bestowed his unequalled daughter on the wielder of the ploughshare, whose breast was as fair and radiant as crystal. Beholding the damsel of excessively lofty height, the chief, whose banner is a palm-tree, shortened her with the end of his ploughshare and she became his wife. Balarāma having espoused, agreeably to the ritual, Revatī, the daughter of Raivata, the king retired to the mountain Himālaya and ended his days in devout austerities.[33]

NOTES

1. The complete series of the different dynasties is found elsewhere only in the Vāyu, the Brahmāṇḍa (which is the same), the Matsya and the Bhāgavata Purāṇas. The Brahma Purāṇa and the Hari Vaṁśa, the Agni, Liṅga, Kūrma and Garuḍa Purāṇas have lists of various extent, but none beyond the families of Pāṇḍu and Kṛṣṇa. The Mārkaṇḍeya contains an account of a few of the kings of the solar dynasty alone; and the Padma, of a part of the solar and lunar princes only, besides accounts of individuals. In the Rāmāyaṇa, Mahābhārata and in the other Purāṇas, occasional short genealogies and notices of individual princes occur. In general there is a tolerable conformity, but this is not invariably the case, as we shall have occasion to observe.

2. In the historical passages of all the Purāṇas in which such occur and especially in the Viṣṇu and Vāyu, verses, apparently the fragments of a more ancient narrative, are frequently cited. It may also be noticed, as a peculiarity of this part of the Purāṇas, that the narration is in prose.

3. Dakṣa is elsewhere said to have been one of the mind-born sons of Brahmā or to have been the son of the Pracetasas : See Bk. I. Ch. XV. n. 5.

4. According to the nomenclature sometimes followed and as we shall have reason to conclude intended in this place, there are ten sons of Manu.

The commentator regards them, however, as but nine, considering Nābhāga-nediṣṭa but one name or Nediṣṭa the father of Nābhaga. The number is generally stated to be nine, although there is some variety in the names, particularly in this name, which occurs Nābhāgadiṣṭa, Nābhāgariṣṭha; and also separated, as Nābhāga, Nabhaga or Nabhāga; Nediṣṭa, Diṣṭa and Ariṣṭa : the latter, as in the Kūrma, distinctly stated, नाभागो ह्यरिष्टः। Again, नेदिष्टः सप्तमः स्मृतः। Brahmā p. The commentator on the Hari Vaṁśa quotes the Vedas for Nābhāgadiṣṭa : नाभागदिष्टं वै मानवमिति श्रुतिः। but the name occurs as Nābhānediṣṭ ha in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa of the Ṛgveda, where a story is told of his being excluded from all share of his inheritance, on the plea of his being wholly devoted to a religious life : नाभानेदिष्टं वै मानवं ब्रह्मचर्य्यं वसन्तं भ्रातरो निरभजन्। See also As. Res. VIII. 384. The name as ordinarily written, Nabhāga, 'no-share', has nevertheless an obvious connection with the legend. The name of Nṛga is found only in our text, the Padma and the Bhāgavata : the Vāyu has Najava. Prānśu is also the reading of the Vāyu and Agni, but not of the rest, which have Veṇa, Vanya, Daṇḍa, Kuśanābha or Kavi, in its place. The Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, p. 113, has Veṇa, Dhṛṣṇu, Nariṣyanta, Nābhāga, Ikṣvāku, Kārūṣa, Śaryāti, Ilā, Pṛṣadhra and Nābhāgāriṣṭha. The Padma Purāṇa, in the Pātāla Khaṇḍa, says there were 'ten' and names them Ikṣvāku, Nṛga, Diṣṭa, Dhṛṣṭa, Karūṣa, Śaryāti, Nariṣyanta, Pṛṣadhra, Nābhāga and Kavi.

5. तत्तापहुते होतुरपचारात्। 'That sacrifice being wrongly offered, through the improper invocations of the Hotri.' It is also read अपहते 'frustrated'. This is rather a brief and obscure allusion to what appears to be an ancient legend and one that has undergone various modifications. According to the Matsya, no change of sex took place in the first instance. The eldest son of Manu was Iḍa or Ila (इडः or इलः), whom his father appointed sovereign of the seven Dvīpas. In his progress round his dominions, Ila came to the forest of Śambhu or Śiva; entering into which, he was changed to a female, Ilā, agreeably to a promise made formerly by Śiva to Pārvatī, who had been once unseasonably broken in upon by some sages, that such a transformation should be inflicted on every male who trespassed upon the sacred grove. After a season, the brothers of Ila sought for him and finding him thus metamorphosed, applied to Vasiṣṭha, their father's priest, to know the cause. He explained it to them and directed them to worship Śiva and his bride. They did so, accordingly; and it was announced by the deities, that, up on the performance of an Aśvamedha by Ikṣvāku, Ila should become a Kiṁpuruṣa, named Sudyumna and that he should be a male one month and female another month, alternately. The Vāyu, which is followed by most of the other authorities states that upon Manu's offering their share of the sacrifice to Mitra and Varuṇa, instead of a boy, a girl was born : according to the Vedas. इडा जज्ञे इति श्रुतिः। Manu desired her to follow him; तामिलेत्यथहोवाच मनुर्दण्डधरः स्मृतेः। अनुगच्छामि भद्रं ते तमिला प्रत्युवाच ह।। whence her name Ilā (from Ila or iḍa, 'come'). There, however, Manu propitiates Mitra and Varuṇa and the girl Ilā or Sudyumna by their favour : as the Mārkaṇḍeya; तथेति ताभ्या मुक्तं तु देवाभ्यां सैवकन्यका। इला दकृः समभवत् सुद्युम्न इति विश्रुतः।। Sudyumna's subsequent change to a female again, is told much as in the Matsya; but his being alternately male and female is not mentioned in the Vāyu any more than it is in our text. The Bhāgavata agrees in that respect with the Matsya, but it has evidently embellished the earlier part of the legend by the introduction of another character, Śraddhā, the wife of the Manu. It is said that it was by her instigation, as she was desirous of having a girl, that the ministering Brāhmaṇas altered the purpose of the rite, in consequence of which a girl, instead of a boy, was born. The similarity of the name has induced the learned author of the Origin of Pagan Idolatry to conceive that he has found the Ila of the Hindus in the Il or Ilus of the Phoenicians. "The Phoenician Il is the masculine Ila of the Hindus and Indo Scythae and Ila was a title of Manu or Buddha, who was preserved in the ark at the time of the deluge:" I. 156 : and the thence concludes that Ila must be Noah; while other circumstances in his Phoenician history identify him with Abraham. I. 159, Again; "Ilus or Il is a regular Cuthic name of Buddha, which the Phoenicians, I have no doubt, brought with them; for Buddha or Manu, in the character of Ila, is said to have married his own daughter, who is described as the offspring of an ancient personage that was preserved in an ark at the time of the deluge." I. 223. Now whatever connection there may be between the names of Ila, Il, Ilus, Ilium, Ilā 'the earth' and Ilos 'slime', there is no very obvious resemblance between the Paurāṇik legends of Ilā and the Mosaic record; nor do the former authorise the particulars of Ila stated by Faber, on the authority probably of Wilford. The Manu Satyavrata, who was preserved in the ark, is never called Ila nor is he the father of Ilā. Buddha was not so preserved nor is Ila ever a title of Buddha. Budha (not Buddha), the husband of Ilā, never appears as her father nor is he a Manu nor is she the daughter of any ancient personage preserved in an ark. There is not therefore, as far as I am aware, any circumstance in the history of Ila or Ilā which can identify either with Abraham or Noah.

6. The Matsya calls the name of third Haritāśva; the Vāyu, Vinatāśva; the Mārkaṇḍeya, Vinaya; and the Bhāgavata, Vimala. All but the last agree in stating that Uktala (Orissa) and Gayā in Bihar are named after the two first. The Matsya calls the third the sovereign of the east, along with the Kauravas; the Vāyu makes him king of the west. The Bhāgavata calls them all three rulers of the south.

7. The authorities agree in this location of Sudyumna. Pratiṣṭhāna was situated on the eastern side of the confluence of the Ganges and Yamunā; the country between which rivers was the territory of the direct male descendants of Vaivasvata. In the Hari Vaṁśa it is said that he reigned in Pratiṣṭhāna, having killed Dhṛṣṭaka, Ambarīṣa and Daṇḍa : सुहास्त्रः कारयामास प्रतिष्ठाने नृपकियां। धृष्टकश्चाम्बरीषश्च दण्डश्चेति हतत्रयः।। M. Langlois had no doubt सुतत्रयः in his copy, as he renders it, 'Il donna naissance ā trois enfans;' though, as he observes, Hamilton and called these the sons of Ikṣvāku. The Brahma Purāṇa has not this passage nor does the commentator on the Hari Vaṁśa give any explanation; neither does any thing of the kind occur elsewhere. We have however, subsequently in the text, Daṇḍa named as a son of Ikṣvāku; and in the Padma Purāṇa, Sriṣṭi Khaṇḍa and in the Uttara Khaṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa, we have a detailed narrative of Daṇḍa, the son of Ikṣvāku, whose country was laid waste by an imprecation of Bhārgava, whose daughter that prince had violated. His kingdom became in consequence the Dāṇḍaka forest. The Mahābhārata, Dāna Dharma, alludes to the same story. If therefore the preferable reading of the Hari Vaṁśa be Sūta, 'son', it is at variance with all other authorities. At the same time it must be admitted, that the same work is singular in asserting any collision between Daṇḍa and his brothers and Sudyumna and the passage seems to have grown out of that careless and ignorant compilation which the Hari Vaṁśa so perpetually presents. It is not improbably a gratuitous perversion of this passage in the Matsya; नाभागस्याम्बतरीषस्तु धृष्टस्यच सुतत्रयं। 'Ambarīṣa was the son of Nābhāga; and Dhṛṣṭa had three sons.'

8. This story has been modified apparently at different periods, according to a progressive horror of the crime. Our text simply states the fact. The Vāyu says he was hungry and not only killed, but ate the cow of his spiritual preceptor, Cyavana. In the Mārkaṇḍeya he is described as being out a hunting and killing the cow of the father of Bābhravya, mistaking it for a Gavaya or Gayal. The Bhāgavata, as usual, improves upon the story and says that Pṛṣadhra was appointed by his Guru Vasiṣṭha to protect his cattle. In the night a tiger made his way into the fold and the prince in his haste and the dark, killed the cow upon which he had fastened, instead of the tiger. In all the authorities the effect is the same and the imprecation of the offended sage degraded Pṛṣadhra to the caste of Śūdra. According to the Bhāgavata, the prince led a life of devotion and perishing in the flame of a forest, obtained final liberation. The obvious purpose of this legend and of some that follow, is to account for the origin of the different castes from one common ancestor.

9. The Bhāgavata also places the Kārūṣas in the north; उत्तरपथगोप्तारः। but the country of the Kārūṣas is usually placed upon the Paripātra or Vindhya mountains (See Bk. II. Ch. III. n. 13).

10. The Vāyu has Nābhāga, the son of Ariṣṭa; नाभागोरिष्टपुत्रस्तु। the Mārkaṇḍeya has, the son of Diṣṭa; दिष्टपुत्रस्तनुनाभागः। the Bhāgavata also calls him the son of Diṣṭa. According to that authority, he became a Vaiśya by his actions. The other Purāṇas generally agree that the descendants of this person became Vaiśyas; but the Matsya and Vāyu do not notice it. The Mārkaṇḍeya details a story of Nābhāga's carrying off and marrying the daughter of a Vaiśya; in consequence of which he was degraded, it is said, to the same caste and deprived of his share of the patrimonial sovereignty, which his son and successor recovered. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa assert that two sons of Nābhāgāriṣṭa again became Brāhmaṇas; but the duties of royalty imply the Kṣatriya caste of his posterity; and the commentator on our text observes that the son of Nābhāga was born before his father's degradation and consequently the race continued Kṣatriya; an assertion unsupported by any authority and it must therefore appear that a race of Vaiśya princes was recognised by early traditions.

11. Bhanandana : Bhāgavata.

12. Vatsaprīti : Bhāgavata, Vatsasrī : Mārkaṇḍeya. The latter has a story of the destruction of the Daitya Kujāmbha by Vidūratha, the father of Sunandra, the wife of Vatsasrī. The Vāyu has Sahasrāri.

13. Pramati : Bhāgavata.

14. According to the Mārkaṇḍeya, the priests of the royal family conspired against this prince and were put to death by his ministers.

15. Cakṣuṣa : Bhāgavata.

16. Vīra : Mārkaṇḍeya.

17. Rambhā precedes Viviṁśati : Bhāgavata.

18. Balāśva or Balakāśva or Subalāśva, according to the Mārkaṇḍeya, which explains his name Karandhama to denote his creation of an army, when besieged by his revolted tributaries, by breathing on his hands (करं + धम:).

19. Both forms occur, as the commentator observes; अविक्षेरेव क्वचिदविक्षिदित्यपि। The Mārkaṇḍeya has a long story of this prince's carrying off the daughter of Viśāla, king of Vaidiśa. Being attacked and captured by his confederated rivals, he was rescued by his father, but was so much mortified by his disgrace, that he vowed never to marry nor reign. The princess, also becoming an ascetic, met with him in the woods and they were finally espoused; but Avikṣit kept his other vow and relinquished his succession in favour of his son, who succeeded to the kingdoms of both Karandhama and Viśāla.

20. Most of our authorities quote the same words, with or without addition. The Vāyu adds, that the sacrifice was conducted by Saṁvartta, whom the Bhāgavata terms a Yogī, the son of Aṅgiras; and that Bṛhaspati was so jealous of the splendour of the rite, that a great quarrel (महान् विवाद:) ensued between him and Saṁvartta. How it involved the king is not told, but apparently in consequence, Marutta, with his kindred and friends, was taken by Saṁvartta to heaven : सम्वर्त्तेन दिवं नीत: ससुहृत् सहबान्धवै:। According to the Mārkaṇḍeya, Marutta was so named from the paternal benediction, 'May the winds be yours,' or 'be propitious to you' (मरुत् तव). He reigned, agreeably to that record, 85000 years.

21. Omitted in the Bhāgavata.

22. A rather chivalric and curious story is told of Dama in the Mārkaṇḍeya. His bride Sumanā, daughter of the king Daśārha, was rescued by him from his rivals. One of them, Bapuṣmat, afterwards killed Marutta, who had retired into the woods, after relinquishing his crown to his son. Dama in retaliation killed Bapuṣmat and made the Piṇḍa or obsequial offering to his father, of his flesh; with the remainder he fed the Brāhmaṇas of Rākṣasas origin : such were the kings of the solar race. बपुष्मतश्च मांसेन पिण्डदानं चकार ह। ब्राह्मणान् भोजयामास रक्ष:कुलसमुद्भवान्।। एवं विधा हि राजानो बभूवु: सूर्य्यवंशजा:।।

23. The Bhāgavata has Bandhavat, Oghavat and Bandha.

24. The Vāyu and Bhāgavata both add that she was the wife of Viśravas and mother of Kubera. In the Liṅga Purāṇa, she is said to have been the wife of Pulastya and mother of Viśravas. The weight of authority is in favour of the former statement. See Bk. I. Ch. X. n. 5.

25. The Bhāgavata names three sons, Viśāla, Śūnyabandhu and Dhūmaketu. Vaiśālī is a city of considerable renown in Indian tradition, but its site is a subject of some uncertainty. Part of the difficulty arises from confounding it with Viśālā, another name of Ujjain; उज्जयिनी स्याद्विशाला। Hemacandra. Also in the Meghadūta, प्राप्यावन्तीं पूर्व्वोद्दिष्टामनुसरपुरीं श्रीविशालीं। 'Having arrived at Avantī, proceed to the illustrious city before indicated, Viśālā.' विशालाभिधानमुज्जयिनीं पुरीं। To the city Ujjayini named Viśālā. Comment. Vaiśīlī however appears to be very differently situated. According to the Buddhists, amongst whom it is celebrated as a chief seat of the labours of Śākhya and his first disciples, it is the same as Prayāga or Allahabad; but the Rāmāyaṇa (I. 45) places it much lower down, on the north bank of the Ganges, nearly opposite to the mouth of the Sone; and it was therefore in the modern district of Sāran as Hamilton (Genealogies of the Hindus) conjectured. In the fourth century it was known to the Chinese traveller Fa-hian as Phi-she-li, on the right bank of the Gaṇḍaka not far from its confluence with the Ganges. Account of the Foekue-ki : Trans. R. As. Soc. no. IX, p. 128.

26. Dhumrākṣa and Samyama : Bhāgavata.

27. The text is clear enough; सृंजयात् सहदेवस्ततः कृशाश्वः। but, as elsewhere noticed (Hindu Theatre, II. 296), the commentator on the Bhāgavata interprets the parallel passage, संयमादासीत् कृशाश्वः सहदेवजः। very differently or सहदेवजः देवजेन सहितः। 'Kriśāśva with Devaja' or as some copies read, Devaka or Daivata, as if there were two sons of Samyama.

28. The Bhāgavata changes the order of these two, making Janamejaya the son of Sumati; or Pramati, Vāyu, Sumati, king of Vaiśālī, is made contemporary with Rāma : Rāmāyaṇa, I. 47. 17. The dynasty of Vaiśāla kings is found only in our text, the Vāyu and Bhāgavata. Hamilton places them from 1920 to 1940 B.C.; but the latter is incompatible with the date he assigns to Rāma, of 1700 B.C. The contemporary existence of Sumati and Rāma, however, is rather unintelligible, as, according to our lists, the former is the thirty-fourth and the latter the sixtieth, from Vaivasvata Manu.

29. The circumstances of their marriage, of Cyavana's appropriating a share of offerings to the Aśvinikumāras and of his quarrel with Indra in consequence, are told in detail in the Bhāgavata and Padma Purāṇas.

30. In most of the other Purāṇas, Reva or Raiva. The Liṅga and Matsya insert a Rocamāna before him; and the Bhāgavata adds to Ānartta, Uttānavarhiṣ and Bhūriśeṇa.

31. The Bhāgavata ascribes the foundation of Kuśasthalī to Revata, who built it, it is said, within the sea : अन्तः समुद्रे। The subsequent legend shows that it was the same or on the some spot, as Dvārakā; and Ānartta was therefore part of Kutch or Gujarat. See Bk. II. Ch. III. n. 77.

32. So called from its many Dvāras or gateways : पुरीं द्वारवती नाम बहुद्वारां मनोरमां। –Vāyu.

33. The object of this legend, which is told by most of the authorities, is obviously to account for the anachronism of making Balarāma contemporary with Raivata; the one early in the Tretā age and the other at the close of the Dvāpara.

CHAPTER 2

द्वितीयोऽध्यायः

(ईक्ष्वाकोर्जन्मः ककुत्स्थवंशस्य युवनाश्वस्य सोमरेश्चोपाख्यानम्)

पराशर उवाच

यावच्च ब्रह्मलोकात् ककुद्मी रैवतो नामाभ्येति तावत् पुण्यजनसंज्ञा राक्षसास्तामस्य पुरीं कुशस्थलीं जघ्नुः॥ १॥

Parāśara said– While Kakudmin, surnamed Raivata, was absent on his visit to the region of Brahmā, the evil spirits or Rākṣasas named Puṇyajans destroyed his capital Kuśasthalī.

तावच्चास्य भ्रातृशतं पुण्यजनत्रासाद् दिशो भेजे। तदन्वयश्च क्षत्रियाः सर्वदिक्षु अभवन्। धृष्टस्यापि धार्ष्टकं क्षत्रं समभवत्। नभागस्यात्मजो नाभागः, तस्याम्बरीषः, अम्बरीषस्यापि विरूपोऽभवत्। विरूपात् पृषदश्वो जज्ञे। ततश्च रथीतरः। तत्रायं श्लोकः।

His hundred brothers, through dread of these foes, fled in different directions; and the Kṣatriyas, their descendants, settled in many countries.[1]

From Dhṛṣṭa, the son of the Manu, sprang the Kṣatriya race of Dhārṣṭaka.[2]

The son of Nabhāga was Nābhāga;[3] his son was Ambarīṣa; his son was Virūpa;[5] his son was Pṛṣadaśva; his son was Rathīnara, of whom it is sung,

एते क्षत्रप्रसूता वै पुनश्चाङ्गिरसः स्मृताः।
रथीतराणां प्रवराः क्षत्रोपेता द्विजातयः॥ २॥

"These, who were Kṣatriyas by birth, the heads of the family of Rathīnara, were called Āṅgirasas (or sons of Aṅgiras) and were Brāhmaṇas as well as Kṣatriyas."[6]

क्षुवतश्च मनोरिक्ष्वाकुर्घ्राणतः पुत्रो जज्ञे। तस्य पुत्रशतप्रवरा विकुक्षिनिमि-दण्डाख्यास्त्रयः पुत्राः। शकुनिप्रमुखाः पञ्चाशत् पुत्रा उत्तरापथरक्षितारो बभूवः। चत्वारिंशदष्टौ च दक्षिणापथे भूपालाः॥ ३॥

Ikṣvāku was born from the nostril of the Manu, as he happened to sneeze.[7] He had a hundred sons, of whom the three most distinguished were Vikukṣi, Nimi and Daṇḍa. Fifty of the rest, under Śakuni, were the protectors of the northern countries. Forty-cight were the princes of the south.[8]

स च इक्ष्वाकुरष्टकायामुत्पाद्य श्राद्धार्हमांसमानयेति विकुक्षिमाज्ञापयामास॥ ४॥

स तथेति गृहीताज्ञो वनमभ्येत्यानेकान् मृगान् हत्वा अतिश्रान्तोऽतिक्षुत्परीतो विकुक्षिरेकं शशमभक्षयत्, शेषञ्च मांसमानीय पित्रे निवेदयामास। इक्ष्वाकुणापि इक्ष्वाकुकुलाचार्य्यस्तत्प्रोक्षणाय वशिष्ठः प्रचोदितः प्राह– अलमनेनामेध्येनामिषेण। दुरात्मनानेन ते पुत्रेण एतन्मांसमुपहतम्, यतोऽनेन शशको भक्षितः। ततश्चासौ विकुक्षिः गुरुणैवमुक्तः शशादसंज्ञामवाप, पित्रापि च परित्यक्तः। पितर्य्युपरते चाखिलामेतां पृथ्वीं धर्मतः शशास। शशादस्य च परञ्जयो नाम पुत्रोऽभवत्॥ ५॥

Upon one of the days called Aṣṭvaka,[9] Ikṣ vāku being desirous of celebrating obsequies, ordered Vikukṣi to bring him flesh suitable for the offering. The prince accordingly went into the forest and killed many deer and other wild animals, for the celebration. Being weary with the chase and being hungered, he sat down and ate a hare; after which, being refreshed, he carried the rest of the game to his father. Vasiṣ ṭha, the family priest of the house of Ikṣvāku, was summoned to consecrate the food; but he declared that it was impure, in consequence of Vikukṣi's having eaten a hare from amongst it (making it thus, as it were, the residue of his meal). Vikukṣi was in consequence abandoned by his offended father an the epithet Śaśāda (hare eater) was affixed to him by the Guru. On the death of Ikṣvāku, the dominion of the carth descended to Śaśāda,[10] who was succeeded by his son Parañjaya.

प्रसन्नश्च देवानामनादिनिधनः सकलजगत्परायणो नारायणः प्राह, ज्ञातमेव मया युष्माभिर्यदभिलषितम् तदर्थमिदं श्रूयताम्॥ ७॥

In the Tretā age a violent war[11] broke out between the gods and the Asuras, in which the former were vanquished. They consequently had recourse to Viṣṇu for assistance and propitiated him by their adoration. The eternal ruler of the universe, Nārāyaṇa, had compassion upon them and said, "What you desire is known unto me. Hear how your wishes shall be fulfilled.

परञ्जयो हि नाम शशादस्य च राजर्षेस्तनयः क्षत्रियवर्यः। तच्छरीरेऽहमंशेन स्वयमेवावतीर्य्य तानशेषानसुरान् निहनिष्यामि, तद्भवद्भिः। परञ्जयोऽसुरवधार्थाय इह कार्योद्योगः कार्य्य इति। एतच्छ्रुत्वा प्रणम्य भगवन्तं विष्णुममराः परञ्जयसकाशमाजग्मुः॥ ८॥

ऊचुश्चैनं भोः भोः क्षत्रियवर्य्य! अस्माभिरभ्यर्थितेन भवता अस्माकमराति वधोद्यतानां साहायकं कृतमिच्छामः॥ ९॥

तद्भवता अस्माकमभ्यागतानां प्रणयभङ्गो न कार्यः।

There is an illustrious prince named Parañjaya, the son of a royal sage; into his person I will infuse a portion of myself and having descended upon earth I will in his person subdue all your enemies. Do you therefore endeavour to secure the aid of Parañjaya for the destruction of your foes." Acknowledging with reverence the kindness of the deity, the immortals quitted his presence and repaired to Parañjaya, whom they thus addressed :

"Most renowned Kṣatriya, we have come to you to solicit your alliance against our enemies : it will not become you to disappoint our hopes."

इत्युक्तः परञ्जयः प्राह,– सकलत्रैलोक्यनाथो योऽयं युष्माकमिन्द्रः शतक्रतुः, अस्य यद्यहं स्कन्धमारूढो युष्मदरातिभिः सह योत्स्ये, तदाह भवतां सहायः। इत्याकर्ण्य समस्तदेवैरिन्द्रेण च बाढमित्येवमन्वीप्सितम्॥ १०॥

The prince replied, "Let this your Indra, the monarch of the spheres, the god of a hundred sacrifices, consent to carry me upon his shoulders and I will wage battle with your adversaries as your ally." The gods and Indra readily answered, "So be it"; and the latter assuming the shape of a bull, the prince mounted upon his shoulder. Being then filled with delight and invigorated by the power of the eternal ruler of all movable and immovable things, he destroyed in the battle that ensued all the enemies of the gods; and because he annihilated the demon host while seated upon the shoulder (or the hump, Kakud) of the bull, he then obtained the appellation Kakutstha (seated on the hump[12]).

The son of Kakutstha was Anenas,[13] whose son was Pṛthu, whose son was Visvagaśva,[14] whose son was Ārdra,[15] whose son was Yuvanāśva, whose son was Śravasta, by whom the city of Śrāvastī[16] was founded. The son of Śravasta was Bṛhadaśva, whose son was Kuvalayāśva. This princc, inspired with the spirit of Viṣṇu, destroyed the Asura Dhundhu, who had harassed the pious sage Uttanka; and hc was then entitled Dhundhumāra.[17] In his conflict with the demon the king was attended by his sons, to thc number of twenty-one thousand; and all these, with the exception of only three, pcrished in the engagement, consumed by the fiery breath of Dhundhu. The three who survived were Dṛḍhāśva, Candrāśva and Kapilāśva; and the son and successor of the elder of these was Haryyaśva; his son was Nikumbha; his son was Sanhatāśva; his son was Kṛśāśva; his son was Prasenajit; and his son was another Yuvanāśva.[18]

Yuvanāśva had no son, at which he was deeply grieved. While residing in the vicinage of the holy Munis, he inspired them with pity for his childless condition and they instituted a religious rite to procure him progeny. One night during its performance the sages having placed a vessel of consecrated water upon the altar had retired to repose. It was past midnight, when the king awoke, exceedingly thirsty; and unwilling to disturb any of the holy inmates of the dwelling, he looked about for something to drink. In his search he come to the water in the jar, which had been sanctified and endowed with prolific efficacy by sacred texts and he drank it. When the Munis rose and found that the water had been drunk, they inquired who had taken it and said, "The queen that has drunk this water shall give birth to a mighty and valiant son." "It was I," exclaimed the Rājā, "who unwittingly drank the water!" and accordingly in the belly of Yuvanāśva was conceived a child and it grew and in due time it ripped open the right side of the Rājā and was born and the Rājā did not die. Upon the birth of the child, "who will be its nurse?" said the Munis; when Indra, the king of the gods, appeared and said, "He shall have me for his nurse" (mām dhāsyati); and hcnce the boy was named Māndhātri. Indra put his forefinger into the mouth of the infant, who sucked it and drew from it heavenly nectar; and he grew up and became a mighty monarch and reduced the seven continental zones under his dominion. And here a verse is recited; "From the rising to the going down of the sun, all that is irradiated by his light, is the land of Māndhātri, the son of Yuvanāśva."[19]

Māndhātā married Bindumatī, the daughter of Śaśabindu and had by hcr three sons, Purukutsa, Ambarīṣa and Mucukunda; he had also fifty daughters.[20]

The devout sage Saubhari, learned in the Vedas, had spent twelve years immersed in a piece of water; the sovereign of the fish in which, named Sammada, of large bulk, had a very numerous progeny. His children and his grandchildren were wont to frolic around him in all directions and he lived amongst them happily, playing with them night and day. Saubhari the sage, being disturbed in devotions by their sports, contemplated the patriarchal felicity of the monarch of the lake and reflected, "How enviable is this creature, who, although born in a degraded state of being, is ever thus sporting cheerfully amongst his offspring and their young. Of a truth he awakens in my mind the wish to taste such pleasure and I also will make merry amidst my children."

इत्येवमभिसमीक्ष्य स तस्मादन्तर्जलान्निष्क्रम्यः निर्वेष्टुकामः कन्यार्थं मान्धातारं राजानमगच्छत्॥ २१॥

Having thus resolved, the Muni came up hastily from the water and desirous of entering upon the condition of a householder, went to Māndhātā to demand one of his daughtcrs as his wife.

As soon as he was informed of the arrival of the sage, the king rose up from his throne, offered him the customary libation and treated him with the most profound respect. Having taken a seat, Saubhari said to the Rājā, "I have determined to marry : do you, king, give me one of your daughters as a wife : disappoint not my affection. It is not the practice of the princes of the race of Kakutstha to turn away from compliance with the wishes of those who come to them for succour. There are, O monarch, other kings of the earth to whom daughters have been born, but your family is above all renowned for observance of liberality in your donations to those who ask your bounty. You have, O prince, fifty daughters; give one of them to me, so that I may be relieved from the anxiety I suffer through fear that my suit may be denied."

When Māndhātā heard this request and looked upon the person of the sage, emaciated by austerity and old age, he felt disposed to refuse his consent; but dreading to incur the anger and imprecation of the holy man, he was much perplexed and declining his head, was lost awhile in thought.

The Ṛṣi, observing his hesitation, said, "On what, O Rājā, do you meditate? I have asked for nothing which may not be readily accorded : and what is there that shall be unattainable to you, if my desires be gratified by the damsel whom you must needs give to me?"

भगवन्! अस्मत्कुलस्थितिरियम्, य एव कन्याया अभिरुचितोऽभिजनवान् वरः, तस्मै कन्या प्रदीयते। भगवद्याञ्चा चास्मन्मनोरथानामप्यगोचरवर्त्तिनी कथमप्येषा सञ्जाता। तदेवमवस्थिते न विद्मः किं कुर्म इति, तन्मया चिन्त्यत इत्यभिहिते तेन भूभुजा मुनिरचिन्तयत्। अहो अयमन्योऽस्मत्प्रत्याख्यानोपायः। वृद्धोऽयमनभिमतः स्त्रीणां किमुत कन्यानामिति अमुना सञ्चिन्त्यैवमभिहितम्॥ २६॥

To this, the king, apprehensive of his displeasure, answered and said, "Grave sir, it is the established usage of our house to wed our daughters to such persons only as they shall themselves select from suitors of fitting rank; and since this your request is not yet made known to my maidens, it is impossible to say whether it may be equally agreeable to them as it is to me. This is the occasion of my perplexity and I am at a loss what to do." This answer of the king was fully understood by the Ṛṣi, who said to himself, "This is merely a device of the Rājā to evade compliance with my suit : he has reflected that I am an old man, having no attractions for women and not likely to be accepted by any of his daughters : even be it so; I will be a match for him:" and he then spoke aloud and said, "Since such is the custom, mighty prince, give orders that I be admitted into the interior of the place.

Should any of the maidens your daughters be willing to take me for a bridegroom, I will have her for my bride; if no one be willing, then let the blame attach alone to the years that I have numbered." Having thus spoken, he was silent.

Māndhātā, unwilling to provoke the indignation of the Muni, was accordingly obliged to command the eunuch to lead the sage into the inner chambers; who, as he entered the apartments, put on a form and features of beauty far exceeding the personal charms of mortals or even of heavenly spirits. His conductor, addressing the princesses, said to them, "Your father, young ladies, sends you this pious sage, who has demanded of him a bride; and the Rājā has promised him, that he will not refuse him any one of you who shall choose him for her husband." When the damsels heard this and looked upon the person of the Ṛṣi, they were equally inspired with passion and desire and like a troop of female elephants disputing the favours of the master of the herd, they all contended for the choice.

"Away, away, sister!" said each to the other; "this is my election, he is my choice; he is not a meet bridegroom for you; he has been created by Brahmā on purpose for me, as I have been created in order to become his wife : he has been chosen by me before you; you have no right to prevent his becoming my husband." In this way arose a violent quarrel amongst the daughters of the king, each insisting upon the exclusive election of the Ṛṣi; and as the blameless sage was thus contended for by the rival princess, the superintendent of the inner apartments, with a downcast look, reported to the king what had occurred.

Perplexed more that ever by this information, the Rājā exclaimed, "What is all this! and what am I to do now! What is it that I have said!" and at last, although with extreme reluctance, he was obliged to agree that the Ṛṣi should marry all his daughters. Having then wedded, agreeably to law, all the princesses, the sage took them home to his habitation, where he employed the chief of architects, Viśvakarman, equal in taste and skill to Brahmā himself, to construct separate palaces for each of his wives; he ordered him to provide each building with elegant couches and seats and furniture and to attach to them gardens and groves, with reservoirs of water, where the wild-duck and the swan should sport amidst beds of lotus flowers. The divine artist obeyed his injunctions and constructed splendid apartments for the wives of the Ṛṣi; in which by command of Saubhari, the inexhaustible and divine treasure called Nanda[21] took up his permanent abode and the princesses entertained all their guests and dependants with abundant viands of every description and the choicest quality.

After some period had elapsed, the heart of king Māndhātri yearned for his daughters and he left solicitous to know whether they were happily circumstanced. Setting off therefore on a visit to the hermitage of Saubhari, he beheld upon his arrival a row of beautiful crystal palaces, shining as brilliantly as the rays of the sun and situated amidst lovely gardens and reservoirs of pellucid water. Entering into one of these magnificent palaces, he found and embraced a daughter and said to her, as the tears of affection and delight trembled in his eyes, "Dear child, tell me how it is with you. Are you happy here? Or not? Does the great sage treat you with tenderness? or do you revert with regret to your early home?" The princess replied, "You behold, my father, how delightful a mansion I inhabit, surrounded by lovely gardens and lakes, where the lotus blooms and the wild swans murmur. Here I have delicious viands, fragrant unguents, costly ornaments, splendid raiment, soft beds and every enjoyment that affluence can procure. Why then should I call to memory the place of birth? To your favour am I indebted for all that I possess.

किन्तु एतन्ममैकं दुःखकारणम्, यदस्मद्भर्त्तास्मद्गेहान्न निःसरति। ममैव केवलमतिप्रीत्या समीपवर्त्ती, नान्यासां मद्भगिनीनाम्, एवञ्च मम सहोदरा दुःखिता इत्येवमतिदुःखकारणम्, इत्युक्तस्तया द्वितीयं प्रासादमुपेत्य स्वतनयां परिष्वज्योपविष्टस्तथैव पृष्टवान्। तयापि तथैव सर्व्वमेतत् प्रासादाद्युपभोगसुखमाख्यातम्। ममैव केवलं पार्श्ववर्ती नान्यासामस्मद्भगिनीनामित्येवमादि श्रुत्वा समस्तप्रासादेषु राजा प्रविवेश। तनयां तनया तथैवापृच्छत्, ताभिश्च तथैवाभिहितः परितोषविस्मयनिर्भरविवशहृदयो भगवन्तं सौभरिमेकान्तावस्थितमुपेत्य कृतपूजोऽब्रवीत्॥ ४०॥

I have only one cause of anxiety, which is this; my husband is never absent from my dwelling : solely attached to me, he is always at my side; he never goes near my sisters; and I am concerned to think that they must feel mortified by his neglect; the only circumstance that gives me uneasiness."

Proceeding to visit another of his daughters, the king, after embracing her and sitting down, made the same inquiry and received the same account of the complaint, that the Ṛṣi was wholly devoted to her and paid no attention to her sisters. In every place Māndhātri heard the same story from each of his daughters in reply to his questions; and with a heart overflowing with wonder and delight he repaired to the wise Saubhari, whom he found alone and after paying homage to him, thus addressed him :

दृष्टस्ते भगवन् सूमहानेष सिद्धिप्रभावो नैवंविधमन्यस्य कस्यचिदस्माभिर्विभूतिविलसितमुपलक्षितम्।

"Holy sage, I have witnessed this your marvellous power; you like miraculous faculties I have never known any other to possess. How great is the reward of your devout austerities! Having thus saluted the sage and been received by him with respect, the Rājā resided with him for some time, partaking of the pleasures of the place and then returned to his capital.

अहो मे मोहस्यातिविस्तारः।

In the course of time the daughters of Māndhātri bore to Saubhari a hundred and fifty sons and day by day his affection for his children became more intense and his heart was wholly occupied with the sentiment of self.[22] "These my sons," he loved to think, "will charm me with their infant prattle; then they will learn to walk; they will then grow up to youth and to manhood : I shall see them married and they will have children; and I may behold the children of those children." By these and similar reflections, however, he perceived that his anticipation's every day outstripped the course of time and at last he exclaimed, "What exceeding folly is mine!

There is no end to my desires. Though all I hope should come to pass for ten thousand or a hundred thousand years, still new wishes would spring up.

When I have seen my infants walk; when I have beheld their youth, their manhood, their marriage, their progeny; still my expectations are unsatisfied and my soul yearns to behold the descendants of their descendants.

I have at last discovered that there is no end to hope, until it terminates in death; and that the mind which is perpetually engrossed by expectation, can never be attached to the supreme spirit.

My mental devotions, while immersed in water, were interrupted by attachments to my friend the fish. The result of that connection was my marriage; and insatiable desires are the consequences of my married life.

The sources of affliction will be repeatedly renewed by their children and by their espousals and by their progeny and will be infinitely increased : a married life is a mine of individual anxiety.

My devotions, first disturbed by the fish of the pool, have since been obstructed by temporal indulgence and I have been beguiled by that desire for progeny which was communicated to me by association with Sammada. Separation from the world is the only path of the sage to final liberation : from commerce with mankind innumerable errors proceed.

My intellect has been a pray to the desire of married happiness; but I will now so exert myself for the salvation of my soul, that, exempt from human imperfections, I may be exonerated from human sufferings. To that end I will propitiate, by arduous penance, Viṣṇu, the creator of the universe, whose form is inscrutable, who is smaller than the smallest, large than the largest, the source of darkness and of light, the sovereign god of gods.

To him I fly for refuge; to that Viṣṇu, who is the teacher of teachers, who is one will all beings, the pure eternal lord of all, without beginning, middle or end and besides whom is nothing."

NOTES

1. According to the Vāyu, the brothers of Raivata founded a celebrated race called Śāryāta, from Śaryāti. The Brahma Purāṇa says they took refuge in secret places (gahana); for which the Hari Vaṁśa substitutes (parvata gaṇa) mountains. The Vāyu has neither and says merely that they were renowned in all regions : विख्याता दिक्षु सर्व्वासु।

2. So the Vāyu, Liṅga, Agni, Brahmā and Hari Vaṁśa. The Matsya names three sons of Dhṛṣṭa, Dhṛṣṭaketu, Citranātha and Raṇadhṛṣṭa. The Bhāgavata adds, that the sons of Dhṛṣṭa obtained Brahmanhood upon earth, though born Kṣatriyas : धृष्टाद्धार्ष्टमभूत् क्षत्रं ब्रह्मभूयं गतं क्षितौ।

3. But who is Nabhāga ? for, as above observed, e. I. n. 2, the son of the Manu is Nabhāga-nediṣṭa and there is in that case no such person as Nabhāga : on the other hand, if Nabhāga and Nediṣṭa be distinct names, we have ten sons of Vaivasvata, as in the Bhāgavata. The descendants of Nediṣṭa, through his son Nabhāga, have been already specified; and after all, therefore, we must consider the text as intending a distinct person by the name Nabhāga; and such a name does occur in the lists of the Agni, Kūrma, Matsya and Bhāgavata, unquestionably distinct from that with which it is also sometimes compounded. The Bhāgavata repeats the legend of the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa with some additions and says that Nabhāga having protracted his period of study beyond the usual age, his brothers appropriated his share of the patrimony. On his applying for his portion, they consigned their father to him, by whose advice he assisted the descendants of Aṅgiras in a sacrifice and they presented him with all the wealth that was left at its termination. Rudra claimed it as his; and Nabhāga acquiescing, the god confirmed the gift, by which he became possessed of an equivalent for the loss of territory. Most of the authorities recognise but one name here, variously read either Nabhāga or Nābhāga, the father of Ambarīṣa. The Vāyu, as well as the Bhāgavata, concurs with the text.

4. The Bhāgavata considers Ambarīṣa as a king, who reigned apparently on the banks of the Yamunā. He is more celebrated as a devout worshipper of Viṣṇu, whose discus protected him from the wrath of Durvāsas and humbled that choleric saint, who was a portion of Śiva : a legend which possibly records a struggle between two sects, in which the votaries of Viṣṇu, headed by Ambarīṣa, triumphed.

5. The Agni, Brahma and Matsya stop with Ambarīṣa. The Vāyu and Bhāgavata proceed as in the text, only the latter adds to Virūpa, Ketumat and Śambhu.

6. The same verse is cited in the Vāyu and affords an instance of a mixture of character, of which several similar cases occur subsequently. Kṣatriyas by birth, become Brāhmaṇas by profession; and such persons are usually considered as Āṅgirasas, followers of descendants of Aṅgiras, who may have founded a school of warrior-priests. This is the obvious purpose of the legend of Nabhāga's assisting the sons of Aṅgiras to complete their sacrifice, referred to in a former note, although the same authority has devised a different explanation. Rathīnara (or Rathītara, as read in some copies, as well as by the Bhāgavata and Vāyu) being childless, Aṅgiras begot on his wife sons radiant with divine glory, who as the sons of the monarch by his wife were Kṣatriyas, but were Brāhmaṇas through their actual father. This however is an after thought, not warranted by the memorial verse cited in our text.

7. So the Bhāgavata : क्षुवतस्तु मनोर्जज्ञे इक्ष्वाकुर्घ्राणतः सुतः।

8. The Matsya says that Indra (Devarāt) was born as Vikukṣi and that Ikṣvāku had one hundred and fourteen others sons, who were kings of the countries south of Meru; and as many who reigned north of that mountain. The Vāyu and most of the other authorities agree in the number of one hundred, of whom fifty, with Śakuni at their head, are placed in the north; and forty-eight in the south, according to the Vāyu, of whom Vimati was the chief. The same authority specifies also Nimi and Daṇḍa as sons of Ikṣvāku, as does the Bhāgavata, with the addition of their reigning in the central regions. The distribution of the rest in that work is twenty-five in the west, as many in the east and the rest elsewhere; that is, the commentator adds, north and south. It seems very probably that by these sons of Ikṣvāku we are to understand colonies or settlers in various parts of India.

9. See Bk. III. Ch. XIV.

10. The Vāyu states that he was king of Ayodhyā, after the death of Ikṣvāku. The story occurs in all the authorities, more or less in detail.

11. The Vāyu says it was in the war of the starting and the stork; आडीवके युद्धे। a conflict between Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra, metamorphosed into birds, according to the Bhāgavata; but that work assigns it to a different period or the reign of Hariścandra. If the tradition have any import, it may refer to the ensigns of the contending parties; for banners, with armorial devices, were, as we learn from the Mahābhārata, invariably borne by princes and leaders.

12. The Bhāgavata adds, that he captured the city of the Asuras, situated in the west; when his name Parañjaya, 'victor of the city:' he is also termed Paranjaya, 'vanquisher of foes;' he is also called Indravāha, 'borne by Indra'.

13. Suyodhana : Matsya, Agni, Kūrma.

14. Viśvaka : Liṅga, Viśvagandhi; Bhāgavata Viṣṭarāśva; Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa.

15. Āndhra; Vāyu, Āyu; Agni, Candra; Bhāgavata.

16. Śāvasta and Śāvasti : Bhāgavata, Śravastī; Matsya, Liṅga and Kūrma, which also say that Śravastī was in the country of Gaura, which is Eastern Bengal; but it is more usually placed in Kośala by which a part of Avadha is commonly understood. In my Dictionary I have inserted Śrāvantī, upon the authority of the Trikāṇḍa Śeṣa, but it is no doubt an error for Śrāvasti; it is there also called Dharmapattana, being a city of some sanctity in the estimation of the Buddhists. It is termed by Fa-Hian, She-wei; by Hwan Tsang, She-lo-va-si-ti; and placed by both nearly in the site of Faizabad in Avadha. Account of the Foe-kue-ki.

17. This legend is told in much more detail in the Vāyu and Brahma Purāṇas. Dhundhu hid himself beneath a sea of sand, which Kuvalyāśva and his sons dug up, undeterred by the flames which checked their progress and finally destroyed most of them. The legend originates probably in the occurrence of some physical phenomenon, as an earthquake or volcano.

18. The series of names agrees very well to Sanhatāśva, called Varhnāśva in the Bhāgavata. We have there some variations and some details not noticed in our text. The Vāyu, Brahma, Agni, Liṅga, Matsya and Kūrma, ascribe two sons to Sanhatāśva, whom the two first name Kriśāśva and Akriśāśva and the rest Kriśāśva and Raṇāśva. Senajit or Prasenjit is generally, though not always, termed the son of the younger brother; but the commentator on the Hari Vaṁśa calls him the son of Sanhatāśva, while the Matsya, Agni, Liṅga and Kūrma omit him and make Māndhātri the son of Ranāsva. The mother of Prasenjit and the wife of Akrśāśva or Sanhatāśva, according to the different interpretations, was the daughter of Himavat, known as Dṛṣadvatī, the river so termed (Bk. II. Ch. III. n. 7). The wife of Yuvanāśva, according to the Vāpu or of Prasenajit, according to the Brahma, was Gaurī, the daughter of Rantīnara, who incurring the imprecation of her husband, became the Bāhudā river (Bk. II. Ch. III. n. 6). The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa call Yuvanāśva her son; but in another place the Hari Vaṁśa contradicts itself, calling Gaurī the daughter of Matīmara, of the race of Puru, the mother of Māndhātri; here following apparently the Matsya, in which it is so stated. The Brahma Purāṇa is not guilty of the inconsistency. The Vāyu of course gives the title to Māndhātri, with the addition that he was called Gaurika, after his mother : तस्यास्तु गौरिकः पुत्रश्चक्रवर्त्ती बभूव ह। मान्धाता यौवनाश्वो वै त्रैलोक्यविजयी नृपः॥ Māndhātri's birth from Gaurī is the more remarkable, as it is incompatible with the usual legend given in our text and in the Bhāgavata, which seems therefore to have been of subsequent origin, suggested by the etymology of the name. In the Bhāgavata, Māndhātri is also named Trasadasyu or the terrifier or thieves.

19. The Vāyu cites this same verse and another, with the remark, that they were uttered by those acquainted with the Purāṇas and with genealogies : अत्राप्युदाहरन्तीमौ श्लोकौ पौराणिका द्विजाः। यावत्सूर्य्यस्य उदयो यावदरस्तमनं भवेत्। सर्व्व-तद्यौवनाश्वस्य मान्धातुः क्षेत्रमुच्यते॥ अत्राप्युदाहरन्तीमं श्लोकं वंशविदो जनाः॥ यौवनाश्वं महात्मानं राजानममितौजसं। मान्धातारं तनुं विष्णोः पुराणज्ञाः प्रचक्षते॥

20. The Brahma and Agni omit Ambarīṣa, for whom the Matsya substitutes Dharmasena. The following legend of Saubhari occurs elsewhere only in the Bhāgavata and there less in detail.

21. The great Nidhi : a Nidhi is a treasure, of which there are several belonging to Kubera; each has its guardian spirit or is personified.

22. Of Mamatā, 'mineness' (ममता); the notion that wives, children, wealth, belong to an individual and are essential to his happiness.

CHAPTER 3

तृतीयोऽध्यायः

(सर्पविनाशमन्त्रवर्णनम्, अनरण्यवंशस्य सगरोत्पत्तेश्च कथनम्)

Having thus communed with himself, Saubhari abandoned his children, his home and all his splendour and accompanied by his wives, entered the forest, where he daily practised the observances followed by the ascetics termed Vaikhānasas (or anchorites having families), until he had cleansed himself from all sin. When his intellect had attained maturity, he concentrated in his spirit the sacramental fires[1] and became a religious mendicant. Then having consigned all his acts to the supreme, he obtained the condition of Acyuta, which knows no change and is not subject to the vicissitudes of birth, transmigration or death. Whoever reads or hears or remembers or understands, this legend of Saubhari and his espousal of the daughters of Māndhātri, shall never, for eight successive births, be addicted to evil thoughts not shall he act unrighteously, nor shall his mind dwell upon improper objects, not shall he be influenced by selfish attachments. The line of Māndhātā is now resumed.

अम्बरीषस्य मान्धातुस्तनयस्य युवनाश्वः पुत्रोऽभूत्। तस्मात् हरितः, यतोऽङ्गिरसो हारिताः॥ ५॥

The son of Ambarīṣa, the son of Māndhātā, was Yuvanāśva; his son was Harita,[2] from whom the Aṅgiras Hāritas were descended.[3]

रसातले च मौनेया नाम गन्धर्वाः षट्कोटिसङ्ख्यास्तैरशैषाणि नागकुलानि अपहृतप्रधानरत्नाधिपत्यान्यक्रियन्त॥ ६॥

In the regions below the earth the Gandharvas called Mauneyas (or sons of the Muni Kaśyapa), who were sixty millions in number, had defeated the tribes of the Nāgas or snake-gods and seized upon their most precious jewels and usurped their dominion. Deprived of their power by the Gandharvas, the serpent chiefs addressed the god of the gods, as he awokc from his slumbers; and the blossoms of his lotus eyes opened while listening to their hymns. They said, "Lord, how shall we be delivered from this great fear?" Then replied the first of males, who is without beginning, I will enter into the person of Purukutsa, the son of Māndhātri, the son of Yuvanāśva and in him will I quiet these iniquitous Gandharvas."

इत्याकर्ण्य भगवते कृतप्रणामाः पुनर्नागलोकमागताः पन्नगपतयो नर्म्मदाञ्च पुरुकुत्सानयनाय चोदयामासुः॥ ८॥

On hearing these words, the snake-gods bowed and withdrew and returning to their country dispatched Narmadā to solicit the aid of Purukutsa.[4]

सा चैन रसातले नीतवती। रसातलगतश्चासौ भगवत्तेजसाप्यायितात्मवीर्य्यः सकल-गन्धर्वान् जघान, पुनश्च स्वभवनमाजगाम। सकलपन्नगपतयश्च नर्म्मदायै वरं ददुः।

Narmadā aecordingly went to Purukutsa and condueted him to the regions below the earth, where, being filled with the might of the deity, he destroyed the Gandharvas. He then returned to his own palaee; and the snake-gods, in acknowledgement of Narmadā's serviees, eonferred upon her as a blessing, that whosoever should think of her and invoke her name, should ncver have any dread of the venom of snakes. This is the invocation; "Salutation be to Narmadā in the morning; salutation be to Narmadā at night; salutation be to you, O Narmadā! Defend me from the serpent's poison." Whoever repeats this day and night, shall never be bitten by a snake in the dark nor in entering a ehamber; nor shall be who ealls it to mind when he cats suffer my injury from poison, though it be mixed with his food. To Purukutsa also the snake-gods announced that the series of his dcscendants should never be eut off.

Purukutsa had a son by Narmadā named Trasadasyu, whose son was Sambhūta,[5] whose son was Araṇya, who was slain by Rāvaṇa in his triumphant progress through the nations. The son of Araṇya was Pṛṣadaśva; his son was Haryyaśva; his son was Sumanas;[6] his son was Tridhanvan; his son was Trayyāruṇa; and his son was Satyavrata, who obtained the appellation of Triśaṅku and was degraded to the condition of a Cāṇḍāla or outcast.[7] During a twelve years' famine Triśaṅku provided the flesh of deer for the nourishment of the wife and children of Viśvāmitra, suspending it upon a spreading fig-tree on the borders of the Ganges, that the might not subjeet them to the indignity of receiving presents from an outcast. On this aceount Viśvāmitra, being highly pleased with him, elevated him in his living body to heaven.[8]

The son of Triśaṅku was Hariścandra;[9] his son was Rohitāśva;[10] his son was Harita;[11] his son was Cuṅcu,[12] who had two sons named Vijaya and Sudeva. Ruruka[13] was the son of Vijaya and his own son was Vṛka, whose son was Bāhu (or Bāhuka). This prinee was vanquished by the tribe of Haihayas and Tālajaṅghas[14] and his country was overrun by them; in eonsequenee of whieh he fled into the forests with his wives. One of these was pregnant and being an object of jealously to a rival queen, the latter gave her poison to prevent her delivery. The poison had the effect of confining the child in the womb for seven years. Bāhu, having waxed old, died in the neighbourhood of the residence of the Muni Aurva. His queen having constructed his pile, ascended it with the determination of accompanying him in death; but the sage Aurva, who knew all things, past, present and to come, issued forth from his hermitage and forbade her, saying, "Hold! hold! This is unrighteous; a valiant prince, the monarch of many realms, the offerer of many sacrifices, the destroyer of his foes, a universal emperor, is in your womb; think not of committing so desperate an act!" Accordingly, in obedience to his injunctions she relinquished her intention.

The sage then conducted her to his abode and after some time a very splendid boy was there born. Along with him the poison that had been given to his mother was expelled; and Aurva, after performing the ceremonies required at birth, gave him on that account the name of Sagara (from Sa, 'with' and Gara, 'poison'). The same holy sage celebrated his investiture with the cord of his class, instructed him fully in the Vedas and taught him the use of arms, especially those of fire, called after Bhārgava.

When the boy had grown up and was capable of reflection, he said to his mother one day, "Why are we dwelling in this hermitage? Where is my father? and who is he?" His mother, in reply, related to him all that had happened. Upon hearing which he was highly incensed and vowed to recover his patrimonial kingdom and exterminate the Haihayas and Tālajaṅghas, by whom it had been over-run. Accordingly when he became a man he put nearly the whole of the Haihayas to death and would have also destroycd the Śakas, the Yavanas, Kambojas, Pāradas and Pahnavas[15], but that they applied to Vasiṣṭha, the family priest of Sagara, (or protection Vasiṣṭha regarding them as annihilated (or deprived of power), though living, thus spoke to Sagara: "Enough, enough, my son, pursue no further these objects of your wrath, whom you may look upon as no more.

In order to fulfil your vow I have scparated them from affinity to the regenerate tribes and from the duties of their castes.[16] Sagara, in compliance with the injunctions of his spiritual guide, contented himself therefore with imposing upon the vanquished nations peculiar distinguishing marks. He made the Yavanas shave (the upper) halt of their heads; the Pāradas wore their hair long; and the Pahnavas let their beards grow. In obedience to his commands.[17] Then also and other Ks atriya races, he deprived of the established usages of oblations to fire and the study of the Vedas; and thus separated from religious rites and abandoned by the Brāhmaṇas, these different tribes became Mlecchhas. Sagara, after the recovery of his kingdom, reigned over the seven-zoned earth with undisputed dominion[18].

NOTES

1. So Manu; "Having reposited, as the law directs, the holy fires in his breast," VI.25.

2. The Vāyu, Liṅga, Kūrma and Bhāgavata agree in this series; the others omit it.

3. The words of the text are, तस्माद्धिरितो यतोऽङ्गिरसो हारिताः। and the commentator explains the phrase, 'the Aṅgiras Brāhmaṇas, of whom the Hārita family was the chief.' The Linga reads, हरितो युवनाश्वस्य हारिता यत आत्मजाः। एते ह्यङ्गिरसपक्षे क्षत्रोपेता द्विजातयः॥ 'Harita was the son of Yuvanāśva, whose sons were the Hāritas; they were on the part (or followers) of Aṅgiras and were Brāhmaṇas with the properties of Kṣatriyas.' The Vāyu has, हरितो युवनाश्वस्य हारीतो भूरयःस्मृताः। एते ह्यङ्गिरसः पुत्राः क्षत्रोपेता द्विजातयः॥ 'Harita was the son of Yuvanāśva, from whom were many called Hāritas; they were sons of Aṅgiras and Brāhmaṇas with the properties of Kṣatriyas.' The Bhāgavata has only, मान्धातृप्रवरा इमे। These (Ambarīṣa, Purukutsa and Harita) were, according to Śrīdhara Svāmī's comments, the chiefs of Māndhātri's descendants, being founders of three several branches; or it may mean, he says, merely that they had Māndhātri for their progenitor, Māndhātri being by some also named Aṅgiras, according to Aśvalāyana. It may be questioned if the compilers of the Purāṇas or their annotators, knew exactly what to make of this and similar phrases, although they were probably intended to intimate that some persons of Kṣatriya origin became the disciples of certain Brāhmaṇas, particularly of Aṅgiras and afterwards founders of schools of religious instruction themselves. Māndhātri himself is the author of a hymn in the Ṛgveda. *As. Res.*VIII.385. Hārīta is the name of an individual sage, considered as the son of Cyavana and to whom a work on law is attributed. It is probably rather that of a school, however, than of an individual.

4. Narmadā, the personified Narmadā river, was according to the Bhāgavata, the sister of the Nāgas.

5. We have some varieties here. Instead of Trasadasyu the Matsya has Dussaha, whom it makes the husband of Narmadā and father of Sambhūti, the father of Tridhanvan. The Bhāgavata omits Samhūti; the Liṅga makes him the brother of Trasadasyu; and the Agni has in his place Sudhanvan.

6. Vṛṣadaśva : Vāyu. The Matsya, Agni and Brahma omit all between Sambhūta and Tridhanvan. The Bhāgavata has a rather different series or Araṇya, Haryyaśva, Aruṇa, Tribandhana, Triśaṅku. As Anaraṇya is famous in Hindu story and Trayyāruṇa is a contributor to the Ṛgveda, their omission shows careless compilation.

7. The Vāyu states he was banished by his father for his wickedness (Adharama). The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa details his iniquity at length; and it is told more concisely in the Liṅga. He carried off the betrothed wife of another man, one of the citizens according to the two former of Vidarbha according to the latter : for this, his father, by the advice of Vasiṣṭha, banished him and he took refuge with Śvapākas. The Rāmāyaṇa has a different story and ascribes Triśaṅku's degradation to the curse of the sons of Vasiṣṭha, to whom the king had applied to conduct his sacrifice, after their father had refused to do so. Before that, he is described as a pious prince (सत्यवादी जितेन्द्रियः) and the object of his sacrifice was to ascend to heaven.

8. The occurrence of the famine and Satyavrata's care of the wife and family of Viśvāmitra, are told, with some variations, in the Vāyu, which has been followed by the Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa. During the famine, when game fails he kills the cow of Vasiṣṭha; and for the three crimes of displeasing his father, killing a cow and eating flesh not previously consecrated, he acquires the name of Triśaṅku (tri, 'three', śaṅku, 'sin'). Vasiṣṭha refusing to perform his regal inauguration, Viśvāmitra celebrates the rites and on his death elevates the king in his mortal body to heaven. The Rāmāyaṇa relates the same circumstance, but assigns to it a different motive. Viśvāmitra's resentment of the gods to attend Triśaṅku sacrifice. That work also describes the attempt of the gods to cast the king down upon earth and the compromise between them and Viśvāmitra, by which Triśaṅku was left suspended, head downwards, in mid-air, forming a constellation in the southern hemisphere, along with other new planets and stars formed by Viśvāmitra. The Bhāgavata has an allusion to this legend, saying that Triśaṅku is still visible in heaven : अद्यापि दिवि दृश्यते। The Vāyu furnishes some further information from an older source : अत्राप्युदाहरन्तीमौ श्लोकौ पौराणिकाः जना। विश्वामित्रप्रसादेन त्रिशङ्कुर्दिवि राजते। देवैः सार्द्धं महातेजाऽनुग्रहात्तस्य धीमतः। शनैर्याति....रम्या हेमन्ते चन्द्रमण्डिता। अलंकृता त्रिभिर्यामैस्त्रिशङ्कुग्रहभूषिता॥ Both my copies leave a blank where it is marked and similar passage does not elsewhere occur; but the word should probably be निशा and the whole may be thus rendered : 'Men aquatinted with the Purāṇas recite these two stanzas; "By the favour of Viśvāmitra the illustrious Triśaṅku shines in heaven along with the gods, through the kindness of that sage. Slowly passes the lovely night in winter, embellished by the moon, decorated with three watches and ornaments with the constellation Triśaṅku." This legend is therefore clearly astronomical and alludes possibly to some reformation of the sphere by Viśvāmitra, under the patronage of Triśaṅku and in opposition to a more ancient system advocated by the school of Vasiṣṭha. It might be no very rash conjecture perhaps, to identify Triśaṅku with Orion, the three bright stars of whose belt may have suggested the three Śaṅkus (stakes or pins) which form his name.

9. The Paurāṇik lists generally dismiss Hariścandra very summarily, but he makes a conspicuous figure in legends of an apparently later date. In the Mahābhārata, Sabhā Parva, it is stated that he resides in the court of Indra, to which he was elevated for his performance of the Rājasūya sacrifice and for his unbounded liberality. This seems to have served as the ground work of the tale told in the Mārkaṇḍeya and Padma Purāṇas, of his having given his whole country, his wife and son and finally himself, to Viśvāmitra, in satisfaction of his demands for Dakṣiṇā. In consequence he was elevated with his subjects to heaven, from when, having been insidiously led by Nārada to boast of his merits, he was again precipitated. His repentance of his pride, however, arrested his downward descent and he and his train paused in mid-air. The city of Hariścandra is popularly believed to be at times still visible in the skies. The indignation of Vasiṣṭha at Viśvāmitra's insatiableness produced a quarrel, in which their mutual imprecations changed them to two birds, the Śarāli, a sort of Turdus and the Vaka or Crane. In these forms they fought for a considerable term, until Brahmā interposed and reconciled them. The Bhāgavata alludes to this story, in its notice of Hariścandra; but the Vāyu refers the conflict to the reign of a different prince : see c. 2.n.11. According to the Śiva Purāṇa, Hariścandra was an especial worshipper of that deity; and his wife Satyavatī was form of Jayā, one of Durga's handmaids.

10. Also read Rohita. Traces of his name appear in the strongholds of Rohtas, in Bihar and in the Punjab. The Bhāgavata has a legend of his having been devoted to Varuṇa, before his birth, by his father, who having on various pleas deferred offering his son as promised, was afflicted by a dropsy. Rohita at last purchased Śunahśephas, who was offered as a victim in his stead : see hereafter, note on Śunaśephas.

11. Omitted : Agni, Liṅga and Matsya.

12. Omitted : Agni, Dhundhu : Liṅga and Kūrma. Campā, founder of Campāmālinī : Bhāgavata. But all other authorities make Campā a different person, a descendant of Aṅga : see family of Anu, of the lunar race.

13. Kuruka : Liṅga and Kūrma. Bharuk : Bhāgavata.

14. Descendants of Yadu. The first springs from a prince who is the twelfth and the second from one who is the eighteenth, in the lunar line and both are thus contemporary with a prince who is the thirty-fifth of the solar dynasty. The Vāyu adds, that they were assisted by Śakas, Yavanas, Kambojas, Pāravas and Pahlavas.

15. The Haihayas we shall have further occasion to notice. The Śakas are, no doubt, the Sacae or Sakai of the classical geographers, Scythians and Indo-Scythians, Turk of Tartar tribes, who established themselves, about a century and half before our era, along the western districts of India and who are not improbably connected with our Saxon forefathers. The Yavanas are the Ionians or Greeks. The Kambojas were a people on the north-west of India, of whom it is said that they were remarkable for a capital breed of horses. There is an apparent trace of their name in the Caumogees of Kaferistan, who may have retreated to the mountains before the advance of the Turk tribes.

(Elphinstone's Caubul, 619 : see also before Bk.II.Ch.III.n.146). The Pāradas and Pahlavas or Pahnavas may designate other bordering tribes in the same that follows, the Bhāgavata enumerates Barbars. The Vāyu adds Māhiṣikas, Caulas, Dārvas and Khasas : the two former of which are people on the Malabar and Coromandal coasts; the two latter are usually placed amongst the mountaineers of the Hindukuśa. The Brahma Purāṇa lengthens the list with the Kolas, the forest races of eastern Goṇḍvānā; the Sarpas and the Keralas, who are the people of Mālābāra. The Hari Vaṁśa still further extends the enumeration with the Tuṣāras or Tokharas, the Turks of Tokharestan; the Chinas, Chinese; the between the Rāmāyaṇa particularly and the works of the era of Vikramāditya. It would seem more likely that the latter appellations were interpolated. It must have been a period of some antiquity, when all the nations from Bengal to the Coromandal coast were considered as Mlecchhas and outcasts.

Sumati the daughter of Kaśyapa and Keśinī the daughter of Rājā Vidarbha, were the two wives of Sagara.[1] Being without progeny, the king solicited the aid of the sage Aurva with great earnestness and the Muni pronounced this boon, that one wife should bear one son, the upholder of his race and the other should give birth to sixty thousand sons; and he left it to them to make their election. Keśinī chose to have the single son; Sumati the multitude : and it came to pass in a short time the former bore Asamañjas,[2] a prince through whom the dynasty continued and the daughter of Vinarā (Sumati) had sixty thousand sons. The son of Asamañjas was Aṅśumat.

Asamañjas was from his boyhood of very irregular conduct. His father hoped that as he grew up to manhood he would reform; but finding that he continued guilty of the same immorality, Sagara abandoned him. The sixty thousand sons of Sagara followed the example of their brother Asamañjas. The path of virtue and piety being obstructed in the world by the sons of Sagara, the gods repaired to the Muni Kalpa, who was a portion of Viṣṇu, free from fault and endowed with all true wisdom. Having approached him with respect, they said, "O lord, what will become of the world, if these sons of Sagara are permitted to go on in the evil ways which they have learned from Asamañjas! Do you, then, assume a visible form, for the protection of the afflicted universe." "Be satisfied," replied the sage, "in a brief time the sons of Sagara shall be all destroyed."

At that period Sagara commenced the performance of the solemn sacrifice of a horse, who was guarded by his own sons : nevertheless some one stole the animal and carried it off into a chasm in the earth. Sagara commanded his sons to search for the steed; and they, tracing him by the impressions of his hoofs, followed his course with perseverance, until coming to the chasm where he had entered, they proceeded to enlarge it and dug downwards each for a league. Coming to Pātāla, they beheld the horse wandering freely about and at no great distance from him they saw the Ṛṣi Kapila sitting, with his head declined in meditation and illuminating the surrounding space with radiance as bright as the splendours of the autumnal sun, shining in an unclouded sky. Exclaiming, "This is the villain who has maliciously interrupted our sacrifice and stolen the horse! Kill him! Kill him!" They ran towards him with uplifted weapons. The Muni slowly raised his eyes and for an instant looked upon them and they were reduced to ashes by the sacred flame that darted from his person.[3]

When Sagara learned that his sons, whom he had sent in pursuit of the sacrificial steed, had been destroyed by the might of the great Ṛṣi Kapila, he dispatched Aṅśumat, the son of Asamaṅjas, to effect the animals' recovery. The youth, proceeding by the deep path which the princes had dug, arrived where Kapila was and bowing respectfully, prayed to him and so propitiated him, that the saint said, "Go, my son, deliver the horse to your grandfather; and demand a boon; your grandson shall bring down the river of heaven on the earth." Aṅśumat requested as a boon that his uncles, who had perished through the sage's displeasure, might, although unworthy of it, be raised to heaven through his favour.

"I have told you," replied Kapila, "that your grandson shall bring down upon earth the Ganges of the gods; and when her waters shall wash the bones and ashes of your grandfather's sons, they shall be raised to Svarga. Such is the efficacy of the stream that flows from the toe of Viṣṇu, that it confers heaven upon all who bathe in it designedly or who even become accidentally immersed in it; those even shall obtain Svarga, whose bones, skin, fibres, hair or any other part, shall be left after death upon the earth which is contiguous to the Ganges." Having acknowledged reverentially the kindness of the sage, Aṅśumat returned to his grandfather and delivered to him the horse. Sagara, on recovering the steed, completed his sacrifice; and in affectionate memory of his sons, denominated Sagara the chasm which they had dug.[4]

The son of Sudāsa having gone into the woods to hunt, fell in with a couple of tigers, by whom the forest had been cleared of the deer. The king slew one of these tigers with an arrow. At the moment of expiring, the form of the animal was changed and it became that of a fiend of fearful figure and hideous aspect. Its companion, threatening the prince with its vengeance, disappeared.

After some interval Saudāsa celebrated a sacrifice, which was conducted by Vasiṣṭha. At the close of the rite Vasiṣṭha went out; when the Rākṣasa, the fellow of the one that had been killed in the figure of a tiger, assumed the semblance of Vasiṣṭha and came and said to the king, "Now that the sacrifice is ended, you must give me flesh to eat; let it be cooked and I will presently return." Having said this, he withdrew and transforming himself into the shape of the cook, dressed some human flesh, which he brought to the king, who, receiving it on a plate of gold, awaited the reappearance of Vasiṣṭha. As soon as the Muni returned, the king offered to him the dish. Vasiṣṭha surprised at such want of prosperity in the king, as his offering him meat to eat, considered what it should be that was so presented and by the efficacy of his meditation discovered that it was human flesh. His mind being agitated with wrath, he denounced a curse upon the Rājā, saying, "Inasmuch as you have insulted all such holy men as we are, by giving me what is not to be eaten, your appetite shall henceforth be excited by similar food."

"It was yourself," replied the Rājā to the indignant sage, "who commanded this food to be prepared." "By me!" Exclaimed Vasiṣṭha; "how could that have been?" and again having recourse to meditation, he detected the whole truth. Foregoing then all displeasure towards the king, he said, "The food to which I have sentenced you shall not be your sustenance forever; it shall only be so for twelve years."

The king, who had taken up water in the palms of his hands and was prepared to curse the Muni, now considered that Vasiṣṭha was his spiritual guide and being reminded by Madayantī his queen that it ill became him to denounce an imprecation upon a holy teacher, who was the guardian divinity of his race, abandoned his intention. Unwilling to cast the water upon the earth, lest it should wither up the grain, for it was impregnated with his malediction and equally reluctant to throw it up into the air, lest it should blast the clouds and dry up their contents, he threw it upon his own feet. Scalded by the heat which the water had derived from his angry imprecation, the feet of the Rājā became spotted black and white and he then obtained the name of Kalmāśapāda or he with the spotted (kalmāśa) feet (pāda). In consequence of the curse of Vasiṣṭha, the Rājā became a cannibal every sixth watch of the day for twelve years and in that state wandered through the forests and devoured multitudes of men.

On one occasion he beheld a holy person engaged in dalliance with his wife. As soon as they saw his terrific form, they were frightened and endeavoured to escape; but the regal Rākṣasa overtook and seized the husband. The wife of the Brāhmaṇa then also desisted from flight and earnestly entreated the savage to spare her lord, exclaiming, "You, Mitrasaha, are the pride of the royal house of Ikṣvāku, not a malignant fiend! It is not in your nature, who know the characters of women, to carry off and devour my husband." But all was in vain and regardless of her reiterated supplications, he ate the Brāhmaṇa, as a tiger devours a deer. The Brāhmaṇa's wife, furious with wrath, then addressed the Rājā and said, "Since you have barbarously disturbed the joys of a wedded pair and killed my husband, your death shall be the consequence of your associating with your queen." So saying, she entered the flames.

At the expiration of the period of his curse Saudāsa returned home. Being reminded of the imprecation of the Brāhmaṇī by his wife Madayantī, he abstained from conjugal intercourse and was in consequence childless; but having solicited the interposition of Vasiṣṭha, Madayantī became pregnant. The child, however, was not born for seven years, when the queen, becoming impatient, divided the womb with a sharp stone and was thereby delivered. The child was then called Aśmaka (from Aśmana, 'a stone'). The son of Aśmaka was Mūlaka, who, when the warrior tribe was extirpated upon earth, was surrounded and concealed by a number of females; whence he was denominated Nārīkavaca (having women for armour)[12]. The son of Mūlaka was Daśaratha; his son was Ilavila; his son was Viśvasaha; his son was Khāṭvāṅga, called also Dilīpa[13], who in a battle between the gods and the Asuras, being called by the former to their succour, killed a number of the latter. Having thus acquired the friendship of the deities in heaven, they desired him to demand a boon. He said to them, "If a boon is to be accepted by me, then tell me, as a favour, what is the duration of my life?" "The length of your life is but an hour," the gods replied. On which, Khāṭvāṅga, who was swift of motion, descended in his easy-gliding chariot to the world of mortals. Arrived there, he prayed, and said, "If my own soul has never been dearer to me than the sacred Brāhmaṇas, if I have never deviated from the discharge of my duty; if I have never regarded gods, men, animals, vegetables, all created things, as different from the imperishable; then may I, with unswerving step, attain to that divine being on whom holy sages meditate!" Having thus spoken, he was united with that supreme being, who is Vāsudeva; with that elder of all the gods, who is abstract existence and whose form cannot be described. Thus he obtained absorption, according to this stanza, which was repeated formerly by the seven Ṛṣis; "Like unto Khāṭvāṅga will be no one upon earth, who having come from heaven and dwelt an hour amongst men, became united with the three worlds by his liberality and knowledge of truth[14]."

The son of Khāṭvāṅga was Dīrgabhāu; his son was Raghu; his son was Aja; his son was Daśaratha[15]. The god from whose navel the lotus springs became fourfold, as the four sons of Daśaratha, Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa, Bharata and Śatrughna, for the protection of the world. Rāma, while yet a boy, accompanied Viśvāmitra, to protect his sacrifice and slew Tādakā. He afterwards killed Mārica with his resistless shafts; and Subāhu and others fells by his arms. He removed the guilt of Ahalyā by merely looking upon her. In the palace of Janaka he broke with ease the mighty bow of Maheśvara and received the hand of Sītā, the daughter of the king, self-born from the earth, as the prize of his prowess. He humbled the pride of Paraśurāma, who vaunted his triumphs over the race of Haihaya and his repeated slaughters of the Kṣatriya tribe. Obedient to the commands of his father and cherishing no regret for the loss of sovereignty, he entered the forest, accompanied by his brother Lakṣmaṇa and by his wife where he killed in conflict Virādha, Kharadūṣaṇa and other Rākṣasas, the headless giant Kabandha and Bāli the monkey monarch. Having built a bridge across the ocean and destroyed the whole Rākṣasas nation, he recovered his bride Sītā, whom their ten-headed king Rāvaṇa had carried off and returned to Ayodhyā with her, after she had been purified by the fiery ordeal from the soil contracted by her captivity and had been honoured by the assembled gods, who bore witness to her virtue.[16]

Bharata made himself master of the country of the Gandharvas, after destroying vast numbers of them; and Śatrughna having killed the Rākṣasas chief Lavaṇa, the son of Madhu, took possession of his capital Mathurā.

Having thus, by their unequalled valour and might, rescued the whole world from the dominion of malignant fiends, Rāma, Lakṣ maṇa, Bharata and Śatrughna reascended to heaven and were followed by those of the people of Kośala who were fervently dcvoted to these incarnate portions of the supreme Viṣ ṇu.

Rāma and his brothers had each two sons. Kuśa and Lava were the sons of Rāma; those of Lakṣmaṇa were Aṅgada and Candraketu; the sons of Bharata were Takṣa and Puṣkara; and Subāhu and Śūrasena[17] were the sons of Śatrughna.

Maru had a son named Praśuśruta; his son was Susandhi; his son was Amarṣa; his son was Mahasvat;[29] his son was Viśrutavat;[30] and his son was Vrihadbala, who was killed in the great way by Abhimanyu, the son of Arjuna. These are the most distinguished princes in the family of Ikṣvāku : whoever listens to the account of them will be purified from all his sins.[31]

NOTES

1. So the Rāmāyaṇa, Sumati is called the daughter of Ariṣṭanemi : the Mahābhārata calls her Śaivyā. The story of Sagara and his descendants is told at length in the Rāmāyaṇa, first book and in the Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, III. 106, et seq., as well as in most of the Purāṇas.

2. O Pañcajana : Brahma.

3. The Bhāgavata has, for a Purāṇa, some curious remarks on this part of the story, flatly denying its truth. न साधुर्वादो मुनिकोपभर्ज्जिता नृपेन्द्रपुत्त्रा इति सत्त्वधामनि। कथं तमोरोषमयं विभाव्यते जगत्पवित्रात्मनि खे रजोभुवः। यस्येरिता सांख्यमयी दृढेहनौर्यतो मुमुक्षुस्तरते दुरत्ययं। भवार्णवं मृत्युपथं विपश्चितः परात्मभूतस्य कथं पृथङ्मतिः॥ "The report is not true, that the sons of the king were scorched by the wrath of the sage; for how can the quality of darkness, made up of anger, exist in a world-purifying nature, consisting of the quality of goodness; the dust of earth, as it were, in the sky? How should mental perturbation distract that sage, who was on with the supreme and who has promulgated that Saṅkhyā philosophy, which is a strong vessel, by which he who is desirous of liberation passes over the dangerous ocean of the world by the path of death?"

4. Sāgara is still the name of the ocean and especially of the Bay of Bengal, at the mouth of the Ganges. On the shore of the island called by the same name, tradition places a Kapilāśrama or hermitage of Kapila, which is still the scene of an annual pilgrimage. Other legends assign a very different situation for the abode of the ascetic or the foot of the Himālaya, where the Ganges descends to the plains. There would be no incompatibility, however, in the two sites, could we imagine the tradition referred to a period when the ocean washed, as it appears once to have done, the base of the Himālaya and Saugor (Sāgara) was at Haridvār.

5. Or Khāṭvāṅga : Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa : but this is apparent an error. See note 14.

6. Omitted : Matsya and Agni. Viśruta : Liṅga.

7. Nābhin : Bhāgavata.

8. Ayutāyus : Vāyu, Liṅga and Kūrma, Śrautāyu : Agni, Ayutajit : Brahma.

9. अक्षहृदयज्ञः 'knowing the heart of the dice'. The same epithet, as well as that of 'friend of Nala' is given him in the Vāyu, Bhāgavata and Brahma Purāṇas and in the Hari Vaṁśa and leaves no doubt of their referring to the hero of the story told in the Mahābhārata. Nala however, as we shall hereafter see, is some twenty generations later than Rituparṇa in the same family; and the Vāyu therefore thinks it necessary to observe that two Nalas are noticed in the Purāṇas and the one here adverted to is the son of Vīrasena; नलौ द्वाविति विख्यातौ पुराणेषु दृढव्रतौ। वीरसेनात्मजश्चैष यश्चैक्ष्वाकुकुलोद्वहः॥ while the other belongs to the family of Ikṣvāku. The same passage occurs in the Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa; and the commentator on the latter observes, निषधात्मजो नलो

वीरसेनसुतान्नलादन्यो। 'Nala the son of Niṣadha is different from Nala the son of Vīrasena.' It is also to be observed, that the Nala of the tale is king of Niṣadha and his friend Rituparṇa is king of Ayodhyā. The Nala of the race of Ikṣvāku is king of Ayodhyā : he is the son of Niṣadha, however and there is evidently some confusion between the two. We do not find Vīrasena or his son in any of the lists. See n. 19.

10. There is considerable variety in this part of the lists, but the Vāyu and Bhāgavata agree with our text. The Matsya and others make Kalmāśapāda the son or grandson of Rituparṇa and place Sarvakāma or Sarvakarman after him. See further on.

11. The Vāyu, Agni, Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa read Amitrasaha, 'foe-enduring'; but the commentator on our text explains it Mitra, a name of Vasiṣṭha, Saha, 'able to bear' the imprecation of; as in the following legend, which is similarly related in the Bhāgavata. It is not detailed in the Vāyu. A full account occurs in the Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, s.176, but with many and important variations. Kalmāśapāda, while hunting, encountered Śaktri, the son of Vasiṣṭha, in the woods; and on his refusing to make way, struck the sage with his whip. Śaktri cursed the king to become a cannibal; and Viśvāmitra, who had a quarrel with Vasiṣṭha, seized the opportunity to direct a Rākṣasas to take possession of the king, that he might become the instrument of destroying the family of the rival saint. While thus influenced, Mitrasaha, a Brāhmaṇa, applied to Kalmāśapāda for food and the king commanded his cook to dress human flesh and give it to the Brāhmaṇa, who, knowing what it was, repeated the course of Śaktri, that the king should become a cannibal; which taking effect with double force. Kalmāśapāda began to eat men. One of his first victims was Śaktri, whom he slew and ate; and then killed and devoured, under the secret impulse of Viśvāmitra's demon, all the other sons of Vasiṣṭha. Vasiṣṭha however liberated him from the Rākṣasas who possessed him and restored him to his natural character. The imprecation of the Brāhmaṇa's wife and its consequences, are told in the Mahābhārata as in the text; but the story of the water falling on his feet appears to have grown out of the etymology of his name, which might have referred to some disease of the lower extremities the prince's designation being at length, Mitrasaha Saudāsa Kalmāśapāda or Mitrasaha, son of Sudāsa, with the swelled feet.

12. His name Mūlaka or 'the root', refers also to his being the stem whence the Kṣatriya races again proceeded. It may be doubted if the purpose of his title Nārīkavaca is accurately explained by the text.

13. This prince is confounded with an earlier Dilīpa by the Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa.

14. The term for his obtaining final liberation is rather unusual; त्रयोऽभिसंहिता लोकाः 'By whom the three worlds were affected or beloved : विषयी कृताः। the three worlds being identified with their source or the supreme. The text says of this stanza, श्रूयते। and the Vāyu, citing it, says इति श्रुतिः। the legend is therefore from the Vedas.

15. The lists here differ very materially, as the following comparison will best show :

Viṣṇu	Matsya	Rāmāyaṇa
Kalmāśapāda	Kalmāśapāda	Kalmāśapāda
Aśmaka	Sarvakarman	Śankana
Mūlaka	Anaraṇya	Sudarśana
Daśaratha	Nighna	Agnivarṇa
Ilavila	Anamitra	Śīghraga
Viśvasaha	Raghu	Maru
Dilīpa	Dilīpa	Prasusruka
Dīrghabāhu	Aja	Ambarīṣa
Raghu	Dīrghabāhu	Nahuṣa
Aja	Ajapāla	Yayāti
Daśaratha	Daśaratha	Nābhāga
		Aja
		Daśaratha

The Vāyu, Bhāgavata, Kūrma and Liṅga agree with our text, except in the reading or a few names; as Śataratha for Daśaratha the first; Vairivīra for Ilavila; and Kritasarman, Vṛddhasarman or Vṛddhakarman, for Viśvasaha. The Agni and Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa agree with the second series, with similar occasional exceptions; showing that the Purāṇas admit two series, differing in name, but agreeing in number. The Rāmāyaṇa, however, differs from both in a very extraordinary manner and the variation is not limited to the cases specified, as it begins with Bhagīratha, as follows :

Purāṇas	Rāmāyaṇa
Bhagīratha	Bhagīratha
Śruta	Kakutstha
Nābhāga	Raghu

Ambarīṣa	Kalmāśapāda
Sindhudvīpa
Ayutāśva
Rituparṇa
Sarvakāma
Sudāsa
Kalmāśapāda

The entire Paurāṇik series comprises twenty descents and that of the Rāmāyaṇa sixteen. Some of the last names of the poem occur amongst the first of thosc of the Purāṇas, but there is an irreconcilable difference in much of the nomenclature. The Agni, under the particular account of the descent of Rāma, has for his immediate predecessors Raghu, Aja, Daśaratha, as in our text; and the author of the Raghu Vaṁśa agrees with the Purāṇas from Dilīpa downwards.

16. This is an epitome of the Rāmāyaṇa, the heroic poem of Vālmīki, on the subject of Rāma's exploits. A part of the Rāmāyaṇa was published, with a translation by Carey and Marshman, several years since; but much more correct edition of the text of the two first books, with a Latin translation of the first and part of the second, have been more recently published by Professor Schlegel; a work worthy of his illustrious name. A summary of the story may be found in Jones' Works, Maurice's Hindustan, Moor's Pantheon. It is also the subject of the Uttara Rāma Carita in the Hindu Theatre, in the introduction to which an outline of the whole is given. The story is therefore, no doubt, sufficiently familiar even to English readers. It seems to be founded on historical fact; and the traditions of the south of Indian uniformly ascribe its civilisation, the subjugation or dispersion of its forest tribes of barbarians and the settlement of civilised Hindus, to the conquest of Laṅkā by Rāma.

17. The Vāyu specifies the countries or cities over which they reigned Aṅgada and Citraketu, as the Vāyu terms the latter, governed countries near the Himālayas, the capitals of which were Āṅgadī and Candravaktrā. Takṣa and Puṣkara were sovereigns of Gandhāra, residing at Takṣaśīlā and Puṣkaravatī. Subāhu and Śūrasena reigned at Mathurā; and in the latter we might be satisfied to find the Śūrasenas of Arrian, but that there is a subsequent origin, of perhaps greater authenticity, in the family of Yadu, as we shall hereafter see. 'Kuśa built Kuśasthalī on the brow of the Vindhya, the capital of Kośalā; and Lava reigned at Śrāvastī (see Bk. IV. Chs. I and II) in Uttara (northern) Kośalāv:' कुशस्य कोशला राज्यं पुरीवा कुशस्थली रम्या निवेशित्वतेन विन्ध्यपर्व्वतसानुषु। उत्तरकोशले राज्यं लवस्य च महात्मनः। श्रावस्ती लोकविख्याता। The Raghu Vaṁśa describes Kuśa at returning from Kuśavatī to Ayodhyā, after his father's death; but it seems not unlikely that the extending power of the princes of the Doab, of the lunar family, compelled Rāma's posterity to retire more to the west and south.

18. The Bhāgavata is the only Purāṇa that omits this name, as if the author had been induced to correct the reading in order to avoid the necessity of recognising two Nalas. See above, n.9.

19. Here again we have two distinct series of princes, independently of variations of individual names. Instead of the list of the text, with which the Vāyu and Bhāgavata nearly and the Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa indifferently conform, we have in the Matsya, Liṅga, Kūrma and Agni the following : Ahīṅagu, Sahasrāśva, Sahasrāya or Sahasrabala, Candrāvaloka, Tārapīḍa or Tārādhīśa, Candgragiri, Bhānūratha or Bhānumitra and Śrūtāyus, with whom the list ends, except in the Liṅga, which adds Bāhula, killed by Abhimanyu : enumerating therefore from Devānīka but seven or eight princes to the great war, instead of twenty-three, as in the other series. The Raghu Vaṁśa gives much the same list as our text, ending with Agnivarṇa.

20. Bala : Bhāgavata Nala : Hari Vaṁśa.

21. Sthala : Bhāgavata, Śala : Vāyu and Brahma. Śīla : Raghu Vaṁśa.

22. Omitted : Bhāgavata.

23. Śaṅkha : Brahma. Khagana : Bhāg.

24. Dūṣitāśva : Vāyu. Adhyūṣitāśva : Brahma. Vidhriti : Bhāgavata.

25. Omitted : Brahma and Bhāgavata.

26. Omitted : Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa : but included with similar particulars by the Vāyu, Bhāgavata and Raghu Vaṁśa : see also Bk. III. Ch. VI, where Kauśalya is likewise given as the synonym of Hiraṇyagarbha, being, as the commentator observes, his Viśeṣaṇam, his epithet or attribute, born in or king of Kośalā. The Vāyu accordingly terms him, हिरण्यनाभः कौशल्यः। but in the Bhāgavata the epithet Kauśalya is referred by the commentator to Yājñavalkya, the pupil of Hiraṇyanābha : यतः सकाशात् कौशल्यो याज्ञवाल्क्यो योगमध्यगात्। The author of the Raghu Vaṁśa, not understanding the meaning of the term, has coveted Kauśalya into the son of Hiraṇyanābha. Raghu Vaṁśa 18.27. The Bhāgavata, like out text, calls the prince the pupil of Jaiminī. The Vāyu, more correctly, जैमिनेः पौत्रस्यः शिष्यः। 'the pupil of the sage's grandson.' There seems to be, however, something unusual in the account given of the relation borne by the individuals named to each other. As a pupil of Jaiminī, Hiraṇyanābha is the teacher of the Sāmaveda (Bk. III. Ch. VI), but Yājñavalkya is the teacher of the Vājasaneyi branch of the Yajuṣ (Bk. III. Ch. V). Neither of them is specified by Colebrooke amongst the authorities of the Pātañjala or Yoga philosophy; nor does either appear as a disciple of Jaiminī in his character of founder of the Mīmāṁsā school. Trans. R. As. Soc. Vol.I.

27. Arthasiddhi : Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa.

28. Maruta : Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa. These authorities omit the succeeding four names.

29. Sahasavat : Vāyu.

30. Viśvasaha : Bhāgavata.

31. The list closes here, as the author of the Purāṇas, Vyāsa, is contemporary with the great war. The line of Ikṣvāku is resumed prophetically in the twenty-second chapter.

The son of Ikṣvāku, who was named Nimi,[1] instituted a sacrifice that was to endure for a thousand years and applied to Vasiṣṭha to offer the oblations. Vasiṣṭha in answer said, that he had been pre-engaged by Indra for five hundred years, but that if the Rājā would wait for some time, he would come and officiate as superintending priest. The king made no answer and Vasiṣṭha went away, supposing that he had assented. When the sage had completed the performance of the ceremonies he had conducted for Indra, he returned with all speed to Nimi, purposing to render him the like office. When he arrived, however and found that Nimi had retained Gautama and other priests to minister at his sacrifice, he was much displeased and pronounced upon the king, who was then asleep, a curse to this effect, that since he had not intimated his intention, but transferred to Gautama the duty he had first entrusted to himself, Vasiṣṭha, Nimi should thenceforth cease to exist in a corporeal form. When Nimi woke and knew what had happened, he in return denounced as an imprecation upon his unjust preceptor, that he also should lose his bodily existence, as the punishment of uttering a curse upon him without previously communicating with him. Nimi then abandoned his bodily condition.

The spirit of Vasiṣṭha also leaving his body, was united with the spirits of Mitra and Varuṇa for a season, until, through their passion for the nymph Urvaśī, the sage was born again in a different shape. The corpse of Nimi was preserved from decay by being embalmed with fragrant oils and resins and it remained as entire as if it were immortal.[2]

ततो भूतान्युन्मेषनिमेषं चक्रुः॥ ९॥

When the sacrifice was concluded, the priests applied to the gods, who had come to receive their portions, that they would confer a blessing upon the author of the sacrifice. The gods were willing to restore him to bodily life, but Nimi declined its acceptance, saying, "O deities, who are the alleviators of all worldly suffering, there is not in the world a deeper cause of distress than the separation of soul and body; it is therefore my wish to dwell in the eyes of all beings, but never more to resume a corporeal shape!" To this desire the gods assented and Nimi was placed by them in the eyes of all living creatures; in consequence of which their eyelids are ever opening and shutting.

अपुत्रस्य च तस्य भूभुजः शरीरमराजकभीरवस्ते मुनयोऽरण्यां ममन्थुः॥ १०॥

तत्र कुमारो जज्ञे, जननाज्जनकसंज्ञाञ्चासाववाप॥ ११॥

As Nimi left no successor, the Munis, apprehensive of the consequences of the earth being without a ruler, agitated the body of the prince and produced from it a prince who was called Janaka, from being born without a progenitor.

अभूद् विदेहोऽस्य पितेति वैदेहो मथनान्मिथिरभूत्। तस्योदावसुः पुत्रोऽभूत्। ततो नन्दिवर्द्धनः, तस्मात् सुकेतुः, तस्यापि देवरातः ततश्च बृहदुक्थः, तस्य च महावीर्य्यः, तस्यापि सत्यधृतिः, ततश्च धृष्टकेतुः, धृष्टकेतोर्हर्य्यश्वः, तस्य च मरुः मरोः प्रतिबन्धकः, तस्मात्, कृतरथः तस्मात् कृतिः, तस्य विबुधः, तस्यापि महाधृतिः, तस्य च कृतिरातः ततो महारोमा, ततः सुवर्णरोमा, तस्यापि पुत्रो ह्रस्वरोमा, ततः सीरध्वजोऽभूत्। तस्य पुत्रार्थं यजनभुवं कृंषतः सीरे सीता दुहिता समुत्पन्नासीत्। सीरध्वजस्य भ्राता साङ्काश्याधिपतिः कुशध्वजनामा। सीरध्वजस्यापत्यं भानुमान्॥ १२॥

In consequence of his father being without a body (videha), he was termed also Vaideha, 'the son of the bodiless;' and he further received the name of Mithi, from having been produced by agitation (mathana)[3]. The son of Janaka was Udāvasu; his son was Nandivarddhana; his son was Suketu; his son was Devarāta; his son was Bṛhaduktha; his son was Mahāvīrya; his son was Satyadhṛti; his son was Dhṛṣṭaketu; his son was Haryyaśva; his son was Maru; his son was Pratibandhaka; his son was Kṛtaratha; his son was Kṛta; his son was Vibudha; his son was Mahādhṛti; his son was Kṛtirāta; his son was Mahāroman; his son was Suvarṇaroman; his son was Hrasvaroman; his son was Sīradhvaja. Sīradhvaja ploughing the ground, to prepare it for a sacrifice which he instituted in order to obtain progeny, there sprang up in the furrow a damsel, who became his daughter Sītā.[4] The brother of Sīradhvaja was Kuśadhvaja, who was king of Kāśī[5] : he had a son also, named Bhānumat.[6]

The son of Bhānumat was Śatadyumna; his son was Śuci; his son was Urjjavaha; his son was Satyadhvaja; his son was Kuni;[7] his son was Aṅjana; his son was Ṛtujit; his son was Ariṣṭanemi[8]; his son was Srutayus; his son was Supārśva; his son was Sañjaya[9]; his son was Kṣemāri[10]; his son was Anenas[11]; his son was Mīnaratha[12]; his son was Satyaratha; his son Śātyarathi[13]; his son was Upagu[14]; his son was Śruta[15]; his son was Sāsvata[16]; his son was Sudhanvan; his son was Subhāsa; his son was Suśruta[17]; his son was Jaya; his son was Vijaya; his son was Rita; his son was Sunaya[18]; his son was Vītahavya; his son was Dhṛti; his son was Bahulāśva; his son was Kṛti, with whom terminated the family of Janaka. These are the kings of Mithilā, who for the most part will be[19] proficient in spiritual knowledge[20].

1. None of the authorities, except the Vāyu and Bhāgavata, contain the series of kings noticed in this chapter.

2. This shows that the Hindus were not unacquainted with the Egyptian art of embalming dead bodies. In the Kāśī Khaṇḍa, s. 30, an account is given of a Brāhmaṇa who carries his mother's bones or rather her corpse, from Setubandha or Rāmeśwara to Kāśī. For this purpose he first washed it with the five excretions of a cow and the five pure fluids or milk, curds, ghee, honey and sugar. He then embalms it with Yakṣakarddama, a composition of Agallochum, camphor, musk, saffron, sandal and a resin called Kakkola; and envelopes it severally with Netravastra, flowered muslin; Paṭṭamvara, silk; Surasavastra, coarse cotton; Mānjiṣṭha, cloth dyed with madder; and Nepala Kambala, Nepal blanketing. He then covers it with pure clay and puts the whole into a coffin of copper. Tāmra sampuṭa. These practices are not only unknown, but would be thought impure in the present day.

3. These legends are intended to explain and were probably suggested by, the terms Vaideha and Mithilā, applied to the country upon the Gaṇḍaka and Kosī rivers, the modern Tirhut. The Rāmāyaṇa places a prince named Mithi between Nimi and Janaka, when comes the name Mithilā. In other respects the list of kings of Mithilā agrees, except in a few names. Janaka the successor of Nimi is different from Janaka who is celebrated as the father of Sītā. One of them, which, does not appear, is also renowned as a philosopher and patron of philosophical teachers. Mahābhārata, Mokṣa dharma. According to the Vāyu Purāṇa, Nimi founded a city called Jayantapur, near the Āśrama of Gautama. The remains of a city called Janakpur, on the northern skirts of the district, are supposed to indicate the site of a city founded by one of the princes so named.

4. This identifies Sīradhvaja with the second Janaka, the father-in-law of Rāma. The story of Sītā birth or rather discovery, is narrated in the Āraṇya Khaṇḍa of the Rāmāyaṇa, the Vana Parva of the Mahābhārata and in the Vāyu, Brahma Vaivartta, Kālika and other Purāṇas.

5. The Rāmāyaṇa says, 'of Sankasya', which is no doubt the correct reading. Fa Hian found the kingdom of Sang-kiashi in the Doab, about Mainpuri. Account of the Foe-Kue-ki. The Bhāgavata makes Kuśadhvaja the son of Sīradhvaja.

6. The Bhāgavata differs from our authority here considerably, by inserting several princes between Kuśadhvaja and Bhānumat; or Dharmadhvaja, who has two sons, Kṛtadhvaja and Khāṇḍikya; the former is the father of Keśīdhvaja, the latter of Bhānumat. See the last book of the Viṣṇu.

7. Śakuni and the last of the series, according to the Vāyu.

8. Between this prince and Śuci the series of the Bhāgavata is Sanadhvaja, Urdhvaketu, Aja, Purujit. The following variations are from the same authority.

9. Citraratha.

10. Kṣemadhī.

11. Omitted.

12. Samaratha.

13. Omitted.

14. Upaguru.

15. Upagupta.

16. Vasvananta.

17. Yuyudhāna, Subhāṣaṇa, Śruta.

18. Śunaka.

19. आत्मविद्याश्रयिणो भविष्यन्ति is the reading of all the copies; but why the future verb, 'will be', is used does not appear.

20. Descendants of two of the other sons of the Manu are noticed in the Bhāgavata; from Nṛga, it is said, proceeded Sumati, Bhūtajyotiṣ, Vasu, Pratiīka, Oghavat and his sister Oghavatī, married to Sudarśana. The Liṅga gives three sons to Nṛga, Vṛṣ a, Dhṛṣṭaka and Raṇadhṛṣṭa and alludes to a legend of his having been changed to a lizard by the curse of a Brāhmaṇa. Nariṣyanta's descendants were Citrasena, Dakṣa, Madhvat, Pūrva, Indrasena, Vītihotra, Satyaśrava, Uruśravas, Devadatta, Agniveśya, also called Jātukarṇa, a form of Agni and progenitor of the Āgniveśya Brāhmaṇas. In the Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa Purāṇa the sons of Nariṣyat, whom the commentator on the latter considers as the same with Nariṣyanta, are termed Sakas, Sacae or Scythians; while, again, it is said that the son of Nariṣyanta was Dama or as differently read, Yama. As this latter affiliation is stated in the authorities, it would appear as if this Nariṣyanta was one of the sons of the Manu; but this is only a proof of the carelessness of the compilation, for in the Viṣṇu, Vāyu and Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇas, Nariṣyanta, the father of Dama, is the son of Marutta, the fourteenth of the posterity of Diṣṭa or Nediṣṭa.

You are able to relate it to me, Brāhmaṇa, if you will so favour me.

Parāśara said–You shall hear from me, Maitreya, an account of the illustrious family of the moon, which has produced many celebrated rulers of the earth; a race adorned by the regal qualities of strength, valour, magnificence, prudence and activity; and enumerating amongst its monarchs Nahuṣa, Yayāti, Kārtavīryārjuna and others equally renowned. That race will I describe to you; do you attend.

Atri was the son of Brahmā, the creator of the universe, who sprang from the lotus that grew from the navel of Nārāyaṇa. The son of Atri was Soma[1] (the moon), whom Brahmā installed as the sovereign of plants, of Brāhmaṇas and of the stars. Soma celebrated the Rājasūya sacrifice and from the glory then acquired and the extensive dominion with which he had been invested, he became arrogant and licentious and carried off Tārā, the wife of Bṛhaspati, the preceptor of the gods. In vain Bṛhaspati sought to recover his bride; in vain Brahmā commanded and the holy sages remonstrated; Soma refused to relinquish her. Uśaṇas, out of enmity to Bṛhaspati, took part with Soma.

Rudra, who had studied under Aṅgiras, the father of Bṛhaspati, befriended his fellow-student. In consequence of Uśaṇas, their preceptor, joining Soma, Jambha, Kujambha and all the Daityas, Danavas and other foes of the gods, came also to his assistance; while Indra and all the gods were the allies of Bṛhaspati.

Then there ensued a fierce contest, which, being on account of Tārakā (or Tārā), was termed the Tārakāmaya or Tārakā war. In this the gods, led by Rudra, hurled their missiles on the enemy; and the Daityas with equal determination assailed the gods. Earth, shaken to her centre by the struggle between such foes, had recourse to Brahmā for protection; on which he interposed and commanding Uśaṇas with the demons and Rudra with the deities to desist from strife, compelled Soma to restore Tāra to her husband. Finding that she was pregnant, Bṛhaspati desired her no longer to retain her burden; and in obedience to his orders she was delivered of a son, whom she deposited in a clump of long Muñja grass. The child, from the moment of its birth, was endued with a splendour that dimmed the radiance of every other divinity and both Bṛhaspati and Soma, fascinated by his beauty, claimed him as their child. The gods, in order to settle the dispute, appealed to Tārā; but she was ashamed and would make no answer. As she still continued mute to their repeated applications, the child became incensed and was about to curse her, saying, "Unless, vile woman, you immediately declare who is my father, I will sentence you to such a fate as shall deter every female in future from hesitating to speak the truth." On this, Brahmā again interfered and pacified the child; and then, addressing Tārā and said, "Tell me, daughter, is this the child of Bṛhaspati or of Soma?" "Of Soma," said Tārā, blushing; As soon as she had spoken, the lord of the constellations, his countenance bright and expanding with rapture, embraced his son and said, "Well done, my boy; verily you are wise:" and hence his name was Budha.[2]

It has already been related how Budha begot Purūravas by Ilā. Purūravas[3] was a prince renowned for liberality, devotion, magnificence and love of truth and for personal beauty. Urvaśī having incurred the imprecation of Mitra and Varuṇa, determined to take up her abode in the world of mortals; and descending accordingly, beheld Purūravas. As soon as she saw him she forgot all reserve and disregarding the delights of Svarga, became deeply enamoured of the prince. Beholding her infinitely superior to all other females in grace, elegance symmetry, delicacy and beauty, Purūravas was equally fascinated by Urvaśī; both were inspired by similar sentiments and mutually feeling that each was everything to the other, thought no more of any other object. Confiding in his merits, Purūravas addressed the nymph and said, "Fair creature, I love you; have compassion on me and return my affection." Urvaśī, half averting her face through modesty, replied, "I will do so if you will observe the conditions I have to propose." "What are they?" inquired the prince; "declare them;" "I have two rams," said the nymph, "which I love as children; they must be kept near my bedside and never suffered to be carried away; you must also take care never to be seen by me undressed; and clarified butter alone must be my food." To these terms the king readily gave assent.

After this, Purūravas and Urvaśī dwelt together in Alakā, sporting amidst the groves and lotus-crowned lakes of Caitraratha and the other forests there situated, for sixty-one thousand years.[4] The love of Purūravas for his bride increased every day of its duration; and the affection of Urvaśī augmenting equally in fervour, she never called to recollection residence amongst the immortals. Not so with the attendant spirits at the court of Indra; and nymphs, genii and quipsters, found heaven itself but dull while Urvaśī was away. Knowing the agreement that Urvaśī had made with the king, Viśavasu was appointed by the Gandharvas to effect its violation; and he, coming by night to the chamber where they slept, carried off one of the rams. Urvaśī was awakened by its cries and exclaimed. "Ah me! Who has stolen one of my children? Had I a husband, this would not have happened! To whom shall I apply for aid?" The Rājā overheard her lamentation, but recollecting that he was undressed and that Urvaśī might see him in that state, did not move from the couch. Then the Gandharvas came and stole the other ram; and Urvaśī hearing it bleat, cried out that a woman had no protector who was the bride of a prince so dastardly as to submit to this outrage. This incensed Purūravas highly and trusting that the nymph would not see his person, as it was dark, he rose and took his sword and pursued the robbers, calling upon them to stop and receive their punishment. At that moment the Gandharvas caused a flash of brilliant lightning to play upon the chamber and Urvaśī beheld the king undressed : the compact was violated an the nymph immediately disappeared.

The Gandharvas, abandoning the rams, departed to the region of the gods. Having recovered the animals, the king returned delighted to his couch, but there he beheld no Urvaśī; and not finding her anywhere, he wandered naked over the world, like on insane. At length coming to Kurukṣetra, he saw Urvaśī sporting with four other nymphs of heaven in a lake beautified with lotuses and he ran to her and called her his wife and wildly implored her to return. "Mighty monarch," said the nymph, "refrain from this extravagance. I am now pregnant : depart at present and come hither again at the end of a year, when I will deliver to you a son and remain with you for one night." Purūravas, thus comforted, returned to his capital. Urvaśī said to her companions, "This princc is a most excellent mortal : I lived with him long and affectionately united." "It was well done of you," they replied; "he is indeed of comely appearance and one with whom we could live happily forever."

When the year had expired, Urvaśī and the monarch met at Kurukṣetra and she consigned to him his first-born Āyus; and these annual interviews were repeated, until she had borne to him five sons. She then said to Purūravas, "Through regard for me, all the Gandharvas have expressed their joint purpose to bestow upon my lord their benediction : let him therefore demand a boon." The Rājā replied, "My enemies are all destroyed, my faculties are all entire; I have friends and kindred, armies and treasures : there is nothing which I may not obtain except living in the same region with my Urvaśī. My only desire therefore is, to pass my life with her." When he had thus spoken, the Gandharvas brought to Purūravas a vessel with fire and said to him, "Take this fire and according to the precepts of the Vedas, divide it into three fires; then fixing your mind upon the idea of living with Urvaśī, offer oblations and you shall assuredly obtain your wishes." The Rājā took the brasier and departed and came to a forest. Then he began to reflect that he had committed a great folly in bringing away the vessel of fire instead of his bride; and leaving the vessel in the wood, he went disconsolate to his palace. In the middle of the night he awoke and considered that the Gandharvas had given him the brasier to enable him to obtain the felicity of living with Urvaśī and that it was absurd in him to have left it by the way. Resolving therefore to recover it, he rose and went to the place where he had deposited the vessel; but it was gone. In its stead he saw a young Aśvattha tree growing out of a Śami plant and he reasoned with himself and said, "I left in this spot a vessel of fire and now behold a young Aśvattha tree growing out of a Śami plant. Verily I will take these types of fire to my capital and there, having engendered fire by their attrition, I will worship it."

Having thus determined, he took the plants to his city and prepared their wood for attrition, with pieces of as many inches long as there are syllables in the Gāyatrī : he recited that holy verse and rubbed together sticks of as many inches as he recited syllables in the Gāyatrī.[5] Having thence elicited fire, he made it threefold, according to the injunctions of the Vedas and offered oblations with it, proposing as the end of the ceremony reunion with Urvaśī. In this way, celebrating many sacrifices agreeably to the form in which offerings are presented with fire, Purūravas obtained a seat in the sphere of the Gandharvas and was no more separated from his beloved. Thus fire, that was at first but one, was made threefold in the present Manvantara by the son of Ilā.[6]

NOTES

1. The Vāyu says the essence of Soma (Somatva) issued from the eyes of Atri and impregnated the ten quarters. The Bhāgavata says merely that Soma was born from the eyes of Atri. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa give a grosser name to the effusion.

2. 'He who knows'. Much erroneous speculation has originated in confounding this Budha, the son of Soma and regent of the planet Mercury, 'he who knows,' the intelligent, with Buddha, any deified mortal, or 'he by whom truth is known;' or, as individually applicable, Gautama or Sakya, son of Rājā Śuddhodana, by whom the Buddhists themselves aver their doctrines were first promulgated. The two characters have nothing in common and the names are identical only when one or other is misspelt.

3. The story of Purūravas is told much in the same strain as follows, though with some variations and in greater or less detail, in the Vāyu, Matsya, Vāmana, Padma and Bhāgavata Purāṇas. It is also referred to in the Mahābhārata, vol. I. p. 113. It is likewise, the subject of the Vikrama and Urvaśī of Kālīdāsa, in which drama the incidents offensive to good taste are not noticed. See Hindu Theatre, vol. I. p. 187. The Matsya Purāṇa, besides this story, which is translated in the introduction to the drama, has in another part, c. 94, an account of a Purūravas, who, in the Cākṣuṣa Manvantara, was king of Mādra and who by the worship of Viṣṇu obtained a residence with the Gandharvas.

4. One copy has sixty-one years; the Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa have fifty-nine : one period is as likely as the other.

5. It does not appear why this passage is repeated. The length of the sticks, conformably to the number of syllables in the usual form of the Gāyatrī, would be twenty-four inches. The Bhāgavata attaches to the operation a piece of mysticism of a Tāṅtrika origin : Purūravas, while performing the attrition, mentally identifies himself and Urvaśī with the two sticks and repeats the mantra, उर्व्वश्या मुरसि पुरूरवाः।

6. The division of one fire into three is ascribed to Purūravas by the Mahābhārata and the rest. The commentator on the former specifies them as the Gārhapatya, Dakṣiṇa and Āhavanīya, which Jones, Manu. II. 231, renders nuptial, ceremonial and sacrificial fires; or rather, 1. Household, that which is perpetually maintained by a house-holder; 2. A fire for sacrifices, placed to the south of the rest; and 3. A consecrated fire for oblations; forming the Tretāgni or triad of sacred fires, in opposition to the Laukika or merely temporal ones. To Purūravas it would appear the triple arrangement was owing; but there are some other curious traditions regarding him, which indicate his being the author of some important innovations in the Hindu ritual. The Bhāgavata says, that before his time there was but one Veda, one caste, one fire and one god, Nārāyaṇa; and that, in the beginning of the Tretā age, Purūravas made them all 'three:' पुरूरव एवासीत्रयी वेत्ता मुखे। that is, according to the commentator, the ritual was then instituted : कर्म्ममार्गः प्रकटो बभूव। The Matsya Purāṇa has an account of this prince's going to the orbit of the sun and moon at every conjunction, when oblations to progenitors are to be offered, as if obsequial rites had originated with Purūravas. The Mahābhārata states some still more remarkable particulars. 'The glorious Purūravas, endowed, although a mortal, with the properties of a deity, governing the thirteen islands of the ocean, engaged in hostilities with the Brāhmaṇas in the pride of his strength and seized their jewels, as they exclaimed against his oppression. Sanatkumāra came from the sphere of Brahmā to teach him the rules of duty, but Purūravas did not accept his instructions and the king, deprived of understanding by the pride of his power and actuated by avarice, was therefore ever accursed by the offended great sages and was destroyed.' विप्रैः स विग्रहं चक्रेवीर्य्योन्मत्तः पुरूरवाः। जहार च विप्राणां रत्नान्युत्क्रोषतामपि॥ सनत्कुमारस्तं राजन् ब्रह्मलोकादुपेत्य च। अनुदर्शं ततष्चक्रे प्रत्यगृह्णान्नप्चायसौ। ततो महर्षिभि क्रुद्धैः सह्यः शप्तो व्यनश्यत। लोभान्वितो वलमदान्नष्टसज्ञो नराधिपः॥

Purūravas had six sons, Āyus, Dhīmat, Amāvasu, Viśvavāsu, Śatāyus and Śrutāyus.[1] The son of Amāvasu was Bhīma;[2] his son was Kāncana;[3] his son was Suhotra;[4] whose son was Jahnu. This prince, while performing a sacrifice, saw the whole of the place overflowed by the waters of the Ganges. Highly offended at this intrusion, his eyes red with anger, he united the spirit of sacrifice with himself, by the power of his devotion and drank up the river. The gods and sages upon this came to him and appeased his indignation and re-obtained Gaṅgā from him, in the capacity of his daughter (when she is called Jāhnavī)[5].

The son of Jahnu was Sumantu;[6] his son was Ajaka; his son was Valākāśva;[7] his son was Kuśā,[8] who had four sons, Kuśāmba, Kuśanābha, Amūrttaya and Amāvasu.[9] Kuśāmba, being desirous of a son, engaged in devout penance to obtain one who should be equal to Indra. Observing the intensity of his devotion, Indra was alarmed lest a prince of power like his own should be engendered and determined therefore to take upon himself the character of Kuśāmba's son.[10]

He was accordingly born as Gādhi, of the race of Kuśa (Kauśika). Gādhi had a daughter named Satyavatī. Ṛcīka, of the descendants of Bhṛgu, demanded her in marriage. The king was very unwilling to give his daughter to a peevish old Brāhmaṇa and demanded of him, as the nuptial present, a thousand fleet horses, whose colour should be white, with one black ear. Ṛcīka having propitiated Varuṇa, the god of ocean, obtained from him, at the only placed called Aśvatīrtha, a thousand such steeds; and giving them to the king, espoused his daughter.[11]

In order to effect the birth of a son, Ricīka[12] prepared a dish of rice, barley and pulse, with butter and milk, for his wife to eat; and at her request he consecrated a similar mixture for her mother, by partaking of which she should give birth to a prince of martial prowess.

Leaving both dishes with his wife, after describing particularly which was intended for her and which for her mother, the sage went forth to the forests. When the time arrived for the food to be eaten, the queen said to Satyavatī, "Daughter, all persons wish their children to be possessed of excellent qualities and would be mortified to see them surpassed by the merits of their mother's brother. It will be desirable for you, therefore, to give me the mess your husband has set apart for you and to eat of that intended for me; for the son which it is to procure me is destined to be the monarch of the whole world, while that which your dish would give you must be a Brāhmaṇa, alike devoid of affluence, valour and power." Satyavatī agreed to her mother's proposal and they exchanged messes.

अथ वनादभ्यागत्य सत्यवतीमृषिरपश्यत् आह चैनाम्–अतिपापे! किमिदमकार्य्यं भवत्या कृतम्, अतिरौद्रं ते वपुरालक्ष्यते, नूनं त्वया त्वन्मातृसत्कृतश्चरुरुपयुक्तः; न युक्तमेतत्॥ १३॥

When Ṛcīka returned home and beheld Satyavatī, he said to her, "sinful woman, what have you done! I view your body of a fearful appearance. Of a surety you have eaten the consecrated food which was prepared for your mother : you have done wrong. In that I had infused the properties of power and strength and strength and heroism; in your, the qualities suited to a Brāhmaṇa, gentleness, knowledge and resignation. In consequence of having reversed my plants, your son shall follow a warrior's propensities and use weapons and fight and slay. Your mother's son shall be born with the inclinations of a Brāhmaṇa and be addicted to peace and piety." Satyavatī, hearing this fell at her husband's feet and said, "My lord, I have done this thing through ignorance; have compassion on me; let me not have a son such as you have foretold : if such there must be, let it be my grandson, not my son." The Muni, relenting at her distress, replied, "So let it be."

Accordingly in due season she gave birth to Jamadagni; and her mother brought forth Viśvāmitra. Satyavatī afterwards became the Kauśikī river.[13] Jamadagni married Reṇukā, the daughter of Reṇu, of the family of Ikṣvāku and had by her the destroyer of the Kṣatriya race, Paraśurāma, who was a portion of Nārāyaṇa, the spiritual guide of the universe.[14]

LEGEND OF PARAŚURĀMA (FROM THE MAHāBHāRATA)

"Jamadagni (the son of Ricīka[15]) was a pious sage, who by the fervour of his devotions, while engaged in holy study, obtained entire possession of the Vedas. Having gone to king Prasenajit, he demanded in marriage his daughter Reṇukā and the king gave her unto him. The descendant of Bhṛgu conducted the princess to his hermitage and dwelt with her there and she was contented to partake in his ascetic life. They had four sons and then a fifth, who was Jāmadagnya, the last but not the least of the brethren. Once when her sons were all absent, to gather the fruits on which they fed, Reṇukā who was exact in the discharge of all her duties, went forth to bathe. On her way to the stream she beheld Citraratha, the prince of Mrittikāvatī, with a garland of lotuses on his neck, sporting with his queen in the water and she felt envious of their felicity. Defiled by unworthy thoughts, wetted but not purified by the stream, she returned disquieted to the hermitage and her husband perceived her agitation. Beholding her fallen from perfection and shorn of the lustre of her sanctity, Jamadagni reproved her and was exceedingly wroth. Upon this there came her sons from the wood, first the eldest, Rumanvat, then Suṣeṇa, then Vasu and then Viśvāvasu; and each, as he entered, was successively commanded by his father to put his mother to death; but amazed and influenced by natural affcction, neither of them made any reply : therefore Jamadagni was angry and cursed them and they became as idiots and lost all understanding and were like unto beasts or birds. Lastly, Rāma returned to the hermitage, when the mighty and holy Jamadagni said unto him, "Kill your mother, who has sinned; and do it, son, without repining." Rāma accordingly took up his axe and struck off his mother's head; whereupon the wrath of the illustrious and mighty Jamadagni was assuaged and he was pleased with his son and said, "Since you have obeyed my commands and done what was hard to be performed, demand from me whatever blessings your will and your desires shall be all fulfilled.' Then Rāma begged of his father these boons; the restoration of his mother to life, with forgetfulness of her having been slain and purification from all defilement; the return of his brothers to their natural condition and for himself, invincibility in single combat and length of days; and all these did his father bestow.

"It happened on one occasion, that, during the absencc of the Ṛṣi's sons, the mighty monarch Kārttavīrya, the sovereign of the Haihaya tribe, endowcd by the favour of Dattātreya with a thousand arms and a golden chariot that went wheresoever he willed it to go, came to the hermitage[16] of Jamadagni, where the wife of the sage received him with all proper respect. The king, inflated with the pride of valour, made no return to her hospitality, but carried off with him by violence the calf of the milch cow of the sacred obation[17] and cast down the tall trees surrounding the hermitage. When Rāma returned, his father told him what had chanced and he saw the cow in affliction and he was filled with wrath. Taking up his splendid bow,[18] Bhārgava, the slayer of hostile heroes, assailed Kārttavīrya, who had now become subject to the power of death and overthrew him in battle. With sharp arrows Rāma cut off his thousand arms and the king perished. The sons of Kārttavīrya, to revenge his death, attacked the hermitage of Jamadagni, when Rāma was away and slew the pious and unresisting sage, who called repeatedly, but fruitlessly, upon his valiant son. They then departed; and when Rāma returned, bearing fuel from the thickets, he found his father lifeless and thus bewailed his unmerited fate : 'Father, in resentment of my actions have you been murdered by wretches as foolish as they are base! By the sons of Kārttavīrya are you struck down, as a deer in the forest by the huntsman's shafts! Ill have deserved such a death; you who have ever trodden the path of virtue and never offered wrong to any created thing! How great is the crime that they have committed, in slaying with their deadly shafts an old man like you, wholly occupied with pious cares and engaging not in strife! Much have they to boast of to their fellows and the friends, they have shamelessly slain a solitary hermit, incapable of contending in arms?' Thus lamenting, bitterly and repeatedly, Rāma performed his father's last obsequies and lighted his funeral pile. He then made a vow that he would extirpate the whole Kṣ atriya race. In fulfilment of this purpose he took up his arms and with remorseless and fatal rage singly destroyed in fight the sons of Kārttavīrya; and after them, whatever Kṣatriyas he encountered, Rāma, the first of warriors, likewise slew. Thrice seven times did he clear the earth of the Kṣatriya caste;[19] and he filled with their blood the five large lakes of Samanta-pañcaka, from which he offered libations to the race of Bhṛgu. There did he behold his sire again and the son of Ṛcīka beheld his son and told him what to do. Offering a solemn sacrifice to the king of the gods, Jāmadagnya presented the earth to the ministering priests. To Kaśyapa he gave the altar made of gold, ten fathoms in length and nine, in height.[20] With the permission of Kaśyapa, the Brāhmaṇas divided it in picces amongst them and they were then called Khaṇḍavāyana Brāhmaṇas. Having given the earth to Kaśyapa, the hero of immeasurable prowess retired to the Mahendra mountain, where he still resides : and in this manner was there enmity between him and the race of Kṣitryas and thus was the whole earth conquered by Rāma."[21]

The son of Viśvāmitra was Śunahśephas, the descendant of Bhṛgu, given by the gods and then named Devarāta.[22] Viśvāmitra had other sons also, amongst whom the most celebrated were Madhuchandas, Kṛtajaya, Devadeva, Aṣṭaka, Kacchapa and Hārita; these founded many families, all of whom were known by the name of Kauśikas and intermarried with the families of various Ṛṣis.[23]

NOTES

1. Considerable variety prevails in these names and the Matsya, Padma, Brahma and Agni enumerate eight. The lists are as follows :

Mahābhārata	Matsya	Agni	Kūrm	Bhāgavata
Āyus	Āyus	Āyus	Āyus	Āyus
Dhīmat	Dhṛtimat	Dhīmat	Māyus	Śrutāyus
Amāvasu	Vasu	Vasu	Amāyus	Satyāyus
Driḍhāyus	Dṛḍhāyus	Uśrāyus	Viśvāyus	Rāya
Vanāyus	Dhanāyus	Antāyus	Satāyus	Vijaya
Śatāyus	Śatāyus	Śatāyus	Śrutāyus	Jaya
	Aśvāyus	Ritāyus
	Divijāta	Divijāta

The list of the Brahma is that of the Mahābhārata, with the addition of Śatāyus and Viśvāyus; and the Padma agrees with the Matsya.

2. Son of Vijayu : Bhāgavata. This line of princes is followed only in our text, the Vāyu, Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa and the Bhāgavata.

3. Kāncanaprabha : Brahma.

4. Hotraka : Bhāgavata.

5. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa add of this prince, that he was the husband of Kāverī, the daughter of Yuvanāśva, who by the imprecation of her husband became the Kāverī river : another indication of the Dakṣiṇa origin of these works. The Hari Vaṁśa has another Jahnu, to whom it gives the same spouse, as we shall hereafter see.

6. Sunuta : Brahma. Purū : Bhāgavata.

7. Valaka : Brahma. Ajaka : Bhāgavata.

8. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa add that Kūsa was in alliance with the Pahlavas and foresters.

9. Our authorities differ as to these names :

Vāyu	Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa	Bhāgavata
Kuśāśva or
Kuśasthamba	Kuśāśva	Kuśāmba
Kuśanābha	Kuśanābha	Kuśanābha
Amurttarayasa	Amurttimat	Amurttaraya
Vasu	Kuśika	Vasu

The Rāmāyaṇa has Kuśāmba, Kuśanābha, Amurttarajasa and Vasu; and makes them severally the founders of Kauśāmbi, of Mahodaya (which afterwards appears the same as Kanouj), Dharmāraṇya and Girivraja; the latter being in the mountainous part of Magadha. I. s. 29.

10. The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa make Gādhi the son of Kuśika; the Vāyu and Bhāgavata, of Kuśāmaba : the Rāmāyaṇa, of Kuśanābha.

11. The Rāmāyaṇa notices the marriage, but has no legend. The Mahābhārata, Vana Parva, has a rather more detailed narration, but much the same as in the text. According to the commentator, Aśvatīrtha is in the district of Kanouj; perhaps at the confluence of the Kālanadī with the Ganges. The agency of the god of Ocean in procuring horses, is a rather curious additional coincidence between Varuṇa and Neptune.

12. In the Mahābhārata, Bhṛgu, the father of Ṛcīka, prepares the Cārū.

13. So the Rāmāyaṇa, after stating that Satyavatī followed her husband in death, adds, that she became the Kauśikī river; the Kosī, which, rising in Nepal, flows through Pūrṇiā into Ganges, opposite nearly to Rājamahal.

14. The text omits the story of Paraśurāma, but as the legend makes a great figure in the Vaiṣṇava works in general. I have inserted it from the Mahābhārata, where it is twice related once in the Vana Parva and once in the Rājadharma section of the Śānti Parva. It is told also at length in the ninth book of the Bhāgavata, in the Padma and Agni Purāṇas.

15. The circumstances of Ricika's marriage and the birth of Jamadagni and Viśvāmitra, are told much in the same manner as in our text both in the Mahābhārata and Bhāgavata.

16. In the beginning of the legend occurs the account of Kārttavīryārjuna, with the addition that he oppressed both men and gods. The latter applying to Viṣṇu for succour, he descended to earth and was born as Paraśurāma, for the especial purpose of putting the Haihaya king to death.

17. In the Rājadharma the sons of the king carry off the calf. The Bhāgavata makes the king seize upon the cow, by whose aid Jamadagni had previously entertained Arjuna and all his train : borrowing, no doubt, these embellishments from the similar legend of Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra, related in the Rāmāyaṇa.

18. The characteristic weapon of Rāma, is however an axe (Paraśu), when his name Rāma, 'with the axe.' It was given to him by Śiva, whom the hero propitiated on mount Gandhamādana. He at the same time received instruction in the use of weapons generally and the art or war. Rājadharma.

19. This more than 'thrice slaying of the slain' is explained in the Rājadharma to mean, that he killed the men of so many generations, as fast as they grew up to adolescence.

20. It is sometimes read Narotsedha, 'as high as a man'.

21. The story, as told in the Rājadharma section adds, that when Rāma had given the earth to Kaśyapa, the latter desired him to depart, as there was no dwelling for him in it and to repair to the sea-shore of the south, where Ocean made for him (or relinquished to him) the maritime district named Śūrpāraka. The traditions of the Peninsula ascribe the formation of the coast of Malabar to this origin and relate that Paraśurāma compelled the ocean to retire and introduced Brahmanas and colonists from the north into Kerala or Malabar. According to some accounts he stood on the promontory of Delhi and shot his arrows to the south, over the site of Kerala. It seems likely that we have proof of the local legend being at least as old as the beginning of the Christian era, as the mons Pyrrhus of Ptolemy is probably the mountain of Paraśu or Paraśurāma. See Catalogue of Mackenzie Collection, Introd. P. xcv. And vol. II. P. 74. The Rājadharma also gives an account of the Kṣatriyas who escaped even the thrice seven times repeated destruction of their race. Some of the Haihayas were concealed by the earth as women; the son of Viduratha, of the race of Purū, was preserved in the Ṛkṣa mountain, where he was nourished by the bears; Sarvakarman, son of Saudāsa, was saved by Parāśara, performing the offices of a Śūdra; Gopti, son of Śivi, was nourished by cows in the forests; Vatsa, the son of Pratarddana, was concealed amongst the calves in a cow-pen; the son of Devīratha was secreted by Gautama on the banks of the Ganges; Vṛhadratha was preserved in Gridhrakūṭa; and descendants of Marutta were saved by the ocean. From these the lines of kings were continued; but it does not appear from the ordinary lists that they were ever interrupted. This legend however, as well as that of the Rāmāyaṇa, b. I. c. 52, no doubt intimates a violent and protracted struggle betwcen the Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas for supreme domination in India, as indeed the text of the Mahābhārata more plainly denotes, as Earth is made to say to Kaśyapa. 'The fathers add grandfathers of these Kṣatriyas have been killed by the remorseless of Rāma in warfare on my account :' एतेषां पितरश्चैव तथैवच पितामहाः। मदर्थं निहता युद्धे रामेणाक्लिष्टकर्म्मणा॥

22. The story of Śunahśephas in told by different authorities, with several variations. As the author of various Sūktas in the Ṛk, he is called the son of Ajigartta. The Rāmāyaṇa makes him the middle son of the sage Ṛcīka, sold to Ambarīṣa, king of Ayodhyā, by his parents, to be a victim in a human sacrifice offered by that prince. He is set at liberty by Viśvāmitra, but it is not added that he was adopted. The Bhāgavata concurs in the adoption, but makes Śunahśephas the son of Viśvāmitra's sister, by Ajigartta or the sacrifice of Hariścandra (see n. 9. Bk. IV. Ch. III). The Vāyu makes him a son of Ṛcīka, but alludes to his being the victim at Hariścandra's sacrifice. According to the Rāmāyaṇa, Viśvāmitra called upon his sons to take the place of Śunahśephas and on their refusing, degradcd them to the condition of Cāṇḍālas. The Bhāgavata says, that fifty only of the hundred sons of Viśvāmitra were expelled from their tribe, for refusing to acknowledge Śunahśephas or Devarāta as their elder brother. The others consented; and the Bhāgavata expresses this; ज्येष्ठं मन्त्रदृशं चक्रुस्त्वामन्वंचो वयं स्म हि। 'They said to the elder, profoundly versed in the mantras. We are your followers:' as the commentator; अनुगन्तारः कनिष्ठा स्म इत्यर्थः। The Rāmāyaṇa also observes, that Śunahśephas, when bound, praised Indra with Ṛcās or hymns of the Ṛgveda. The origin of the story therefore, whatever may be its correct version, must be referred to the Vedas; and it evidently alludes to some innovation in the ritual, adopted by a part only of the Kauśika families of Brāhmaṇas.

23. The Bhāgavata says one hundred sons, besides Devarāta and others, as Aṣṭaka, Hārita. Much longer lists of names are given in the Vāyu, Bhāgavana, Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa. The two latter specify the mothers. Thus Devaśravas, Kati (the founder of the Kātyāyanas) and Hiraṇyākṣa were sons of Śīlavatī; Reṇuka, Gālava, Sankriti, Mudgala, Madhucchandas and Devala were sons of Reṇu; and Aṣṭaka, Kacchapa and Hārita were the sons of Dṛṣadvatī. The same works enumerate the Gotras, the families or tribes of the Kauśika Brāhmaṇas : these are Pārthivas, Devarātas, Yājñavalkyas, Sāmarṣanas, Uḍumbaras, Dumlānas, Tarakāyanas, Muncātas, Lohitas, Reṇus, Kariṣus, Babhrus, Pāninas, Dhyānajyāpyas, Śyālantas, Hiraṇyākṣas, Śaṅkus, Gālavas, Yamadūtas, Devalas, Śālankāyanas, Bāṣkalas, Dadativādaras, Śauśratas, Saindhavāyanas, Niṣṇātas, Cunculas, Śālankkrityas, Sankrityas, Vādaraṇyas and an infinity of others, multiplied by intermarriages with other tribes and who, according to the Vāyu, were originally of the regal caste, like Viśvāmitra; but, like him, obtained Brahmanhood through devotion.

Now these gotras or some of them at least, no doubt existed, partaking more of the character of schools of doctrine, but in which teachers and scholars were very likely to have become of one family by intermarrying; and the whole, as well as their original founder, imply the interference of the Kṣatriya caste with the Brahmanical monopoly of religious instruction and composition.

Āyus, the eldest son of Purūravas, married the daughter of Rāhu (or Ārāhu), by whom he had five sons, Nāhuṣa, Kṣatravṛddha,[1] Rambhā,[2] Raji and Anenas.[3] The son of Kṣatravṛddha was Suhotra,[4] who had three sons, Kāśa,[5] Leśa[6] and Ghṛtasamada. The son of that last was Śaunaka,[7] who first established the distinctions of the four castes.[8] The son of Kāśa was Kaśirājā;[9] his son was Dīrghatamas;[10] his son was Dhanvantari, whose nature was exempt from human infirmities and who in every existence had been master of universal knowledge. In his past life (or when he was produced by the agitation of the milky sea), Nārāyaṇa had conferred upon him the boon, that he should subsequently be born in the family of Kāśīrājā, should compose the eight-fold system of medical science[11] and should be thereafter entitled to a share of offerings made to the gods. The son of Dhanvantari was Ketumat; his son was Bhīmaratha; his son was Divodāsa;[12] his son was Pratarddana, so named from destroying the race of Bhadraśreṇya. He had various other appellations, as Śatrujit, 'the victor over his foes,' from having vanquished all his enemies; Vatsa, or 'child', from his father's frequently calling him by that name; Ritadhvaja, 'he whose emblem was truth,' being a great observer of veracity; and Kuvalayāśva, because he had a horse (aśva) called Kuvalaya.[13] The son of this prince was Alarka, of whom this verse is sung in the present day; "For sixty thousand and sixty hundred years no other youthful monarch except Alarka, reigned over the earth."[14]

The son of Alarka was Santati;[15] his son was Sunītha; his son was Suketu; his son was Dharmaketu; his son was Satyaketu; his son was Vibhu; his son was Suvibhu; his son was Sukumāra; his son was Dhṛṣṭketu; his son was Vaiṇahotra; his son was Bhārga; his son was Bhargabhūmi; from whom also rules for the four castes were promulgated.[16] These are the Kāśya princes or descendants of Kāśa.[17] We will now enumerate the descendants of Raji.

NOTES

1. Dharmavṛddha : Vāyu. Vṛddhaśarman : Matsya. Yajñaśarman : Padma.

2. Darbha : Agni. Dambha : Padma.

3. Vipāpman : Agni and Matsya, Vidāman : Padma. The two last authorities proceed no further with this line.

4. Sunahotra : Vāyu, Brahma.

5. Kāśya : Bhāgavata.

6. Sāla : Vāyu, Brahma, Hari Vaṁśa : whose son was Ārṣṭisena, father of Caranta; Vāyu : of Kaśyapa; Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa.

7. Here is probably an error, for the Vāyu, Bhāgavata and Brahma agree in making Śunaka the son of Ghṛtsamada and father of Śaunaka.

8. The expression is चातुर्वर्ण्य प्रवर्त्तयिता। 'The originator or causer of the distinctions (or duties) of the four castes.' The commentator, however, understands the expression to signify, that his descendants were of the four castes. So also the Vāyu : पुत्रो घृत्समदस्य च शुनको यस्य शौनकः। ब्राह्मणा क्षत्रियाश्चैव वैश्या शूद्रास्तथैवच। एतस्य वंशेसमुद्गूताः विचित्रैः कर्म्मभिर्द्विजाः॥ 'The son of Ghṛtsamda was Śunaka, whose son was Śaunaka, Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriya, Vaiśyas and Śūdras were born in his race; Brāhmaṇas by distinguished deeds.' The existence of but one caste in the age of purity, however incompatible with the legend which ascribes the origin of the four tribes to Brahmā, is everywhere admitted. Their separation is assigned to different individuals, whether accurately to any one may be doubted; but the notion indicates that the distinction was of a social or political character.

9. Kāśiya : Brahma.

10. Dīrghatapas : Vāyu. Ghṛtsatamas :Agni. The Bhāgavata inserts a Rāṣṭra before this prince and the Vāyu a Dharma after him.

11. The eight branches of medical science are, 1. Śalya, extraction of extraneous bodies; 2. Śalākā, treatment of external organic affections : these two constitute surgery; 3. Cikitsā, administration of medicines or medical treatment in general; 4. Bhūtavidyā, treatment of maladies referred to demoniac possession; 5. Kaumārabhṛtya, midwifery and management of children; 6. Agada, alexipharmacy; 7. Rasāyana, al-chemical therapeutics; 8. Bajikaraṇa, use of aphrodisiacs. Dhanvantari, according to the Brahma Vaivartta Purāṇa, was preceded in medical science by Ātreya, Bharadvāja and Caraka : his pupil Śuśruta is the reputed author of a celebrated work still extant. It seems probable that Kāśī or Banārasa was at an early period a celebrated school of medicine.

12. Some rather curious legends are connected with this prince in the Vāyu and Brahma Purāṇas and Hari Vaṁśa and especially in the Kāśī Khaṇḍa of the Skanda Purāṇa. According to these authorities, Śiva and Pārvatī, desirous of occupying Kāśī, which Divodāsa possessed, sent Nikumbha, one of the Gaṇas of the former, to lead the prince to the adoption of Buddhist doctrines; in consequence of which he was expelled from the sacred city and according to the Vāyu, founded another on the banks of the Gomatī. We have, however, also some singular, though obscure intimations of some of the political events of this and the succeeding reign. The passage of the Vāyu is, भद्रश्रेण्यस्य पुत्राणां शतमुत्तमधन्विनां। हत्वा निवेशयामास दिवोदासो नराधिपः॥ भद्रश्रेण्यस्य राज्यं तु हृतं तेन वलीयसा। भद्रश्रेण्यस्य पुत्रस्तु दुर्हमो नाम नामतः। दिवोदासेन वालेति घृणया स विवर्ज्जितः॥ दिवोदासाददृषद्वत्यां वीरो यज्ञे प्रतर्हनः। तेन पुत्रेण बालेन प्रहृतं तस्य वै पुनः। वैरस्यान्तं महा राज्ञा तदा तेन विधित्सता॥ 'The king of Divodāsa, having slain the hundred sons of Bhadraśreṇya, took possession of his kingdom, which was conquered by that hero. The son of Bhadraśreṇya, celebrated by the name of Durddama, was spared by Divodāsa, as being an infant. Protarddana was the son of Divodāsa by Dṛṣ advatī; and by that great prince, desirous of destroying all enmity, (was recovered) that (territory) which had been seized by that young boy (Durdama).' This is not very explicit and something is wanted to complete the sense. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa tell the story twice over, chiefly in the words of the Vāyu, but with some additions. In chapter 29 we have, first, the first three lines of the above extract; then comes the story of Banārasa being deserted; we then have the two next lines; then follow, हैहयस्य तु दायाह्यं हृतवान् स महीपतिः। आजह्रे पितृदयाह्यं दिवोदास हृतं बलात्। भद्रश्रेण्यस्य पुत्रेण दुर्द्दमेन महात्मना। वैरस्यान्तं महाराज क्षत्रियेण विधित्सता॥ 'The prince (Durddama) invading his patrimonial possessions, the territory which Divodāsa had seized by force was recovered by the gallant son of Bhadraśreṇya, Durddama, a warrior desirous, mighty king, to effect the destruction of his foes.' Here the victory is ascribed to Durddama, in opposition to what appears to be the sense of the Vāyu and what is undoubtedly that of our text, which says that he was called Pratarddana from destroying the race of Bhadraśreṇya and Śatrujit from vanquishing all his foes : ततः प्रतर्हनो भद्रश्रेण्यवंशविनाशादशेषशत्रवोऽनेन जिता इति शत्रु जिदभवत्। By Variasya anta, 'the end of hostility or enmity', is obviously not to be understood here, as M. Langlois has intimated, a friendly pacification, but the end or destruction of all enemies. In the 32nd chapter of the Hari Vaṁśa we have precisely the same lines, slightly varied as to their order; but they are preceded by this verse; भद्रश्रेण्यस्य पूर्व्वतुं पुरीं वाराणसी भवात् यदुवंश प्रमूतस्य तपस्यभिरतस्य च॥ 'The city (that on the Gomatī), before the existence of Banārasa, of Bhadraśreṇya, a pious of the Yadu race.' This verse is not in the Brahma Purāṇa. After giving the rest of the above quotation, except the last line, the passage proceeds, अष्टारथो नाम नृपः सुतो भीमरथस्य वै। तेन पुत्रेषु बालेषु प्रहृतं तस्य भारत। वैरस्यान्तं महाराज्ञ क्षत्रियेण विधित्सता। 'The king called Aṣṭaratha was the son of Bhīmaratha; and by him, great king, a warrior desirous of destroying his foes was (the country) recovered, the children (of Durddama) being infants.' तस्य दुर्द्दमस्य पुत्रेष्वसमर्थेषु। Com. According to the same authority, we are here to understand Bhīmaratha and Aṣṭaratha as epithets of Divodāsa and Pratarddana. From these scanty and ill-digested notices it appears, that Divodāsa, on being expelled from Banārasa, took some city and district on the Gomatī from the family of Bhadraśreṇya; that Durddama recovered the country and that Pratarddana again conquered it from his descendants. The alternation concerned apparently only bordering districts, for the princes of Māhiṣamati and of Kāśī continue, in both an earlier and a later series, in undisturbed possession of their capitals and their power.

13. The Vāyu, Agni, Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa interpose two sons of Pratarddana, Garga or Bharga and Vatsa; and they make Vatsa the father of Alarka, except the Brahma, which has Śatrujit and Ṛtadhvaja as two princes following Vatsa.

14. The Vāyu, Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa repeat this stanza and add that Alarka enjoyed such protracted existence through the favour of Lopamudrā and that having lived till the period at which the curse upon Kāśī terminated, he killed the Rākṣasas Kṣemaka, by whom it had been occupied after it was abandoned by Divodāsa and caused the city to be reinhabited, शापस्यान्ते महावाहुर्हत्वा क्षेमकराक्षसं रम्यों वासयामास पुरीं वाराणसीं पुनः। The Hari Vaṁśa agrees as usual with the Brahma, except in the reading of one or two names. It is to be observed, however, that the Agni makes the Kāśī princes the descendants of Vitatha, the successor of Bharata. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa, determined apparently to be right, give the list twice over, deriving it in one place from Kṣatravṛddha, as in our text, the Vāyu and the Bhāgavata; and in another, with the Agni, from Vitatha. The series of the Brahma, however, stops with Lauhi, the son of Alarka and does not warrant the repetition which the carelessness of the compiler of the Hari Vaṁśa has superfluously inserted.

15. Several varieties occur, in the series that follows, as the comparative lists will best show :

Bhāgavata	Brahma	Vāyu	Agni
Alarka	Alarka	Alarka	Alarka
Santati	Sannati	Sannati	Dharmaketu
Sunītha	Sunītha	Sunītha	Vibhu
Suketana	Kṣema	Suketu	Sukumāra
Dharmaketu	Ketumat	Dhṛṣṭaketu	Satyaketu
Satyaketu	Suketu	Veṇuhotra
Dhṛṣṭaketu	Dharmaketu	Gārgya
Sukumāra	Satyaketu	Gargabhūmi
Vītihotra	Vibhu	Vatsabhūmi
Bhārga	Anartta
Bhargabhūmi	Sukumāra
	Dhṛṣṭaketu
	Veṇuhotri
	Bharga
	Vatsabhūmi

16. Our text is clear enough and so is the Bhāgavata, but the Vāyu, Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa contain additions of rather doubtful import. The former has, वेणुहोत्र मुतश्चापि गार्ग्यो वै नामविश्रुतः गार्ग्यस्य

गर्गभूमिस्तु वत्सोवत्सस्य धीमतः ब्राह्मणाः क्षत्रियाश्चैव तयोः पुत्रा मुधार्म्मिकाः। 'The son of Veṇuhotra was the celebrated Gārgya; Gargabhūmi was the son of Gārgya; and Vatsa, of the wise Vatsa; virtuous Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas were the sons of these two.' By the second Vatsa is perhaps meant Vatsabhūmi; and the purpose of the passage is, that Gārgya (or possibly rather Bharga, one of the sons of Pratarddana) and Vatsa were the founders of two races (Bhūmi, 'earth,' implying 'source' or 'founder'), who were Kṣatriyas by birth and Brāhmaṇas by profession. The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa apparently misunderstanding this text, have increased the perplexity. According to them, the son of Veṇuhotra was Bharga; Vatsabhūmi was the son of Vatsa; and Bhārgabhūmi (Bhṛgubhūmi, Brahma) was from Bhārgava. 'These sons of Aṅgiras were born in the family of Bhṛgu, thousands of great might, Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaiśyas.' वेणुहोत्रसु तश्चापि भर्गो नाम प्रजेश्वरः। वत्सस्य वत्सभूमिस्तु भर्गभूमिस्तुभार्गवात् (भृगुभूमिस्तुभार्गवात्)। एतेह्यङ्गिरसः पुत्राः जाता वशेंऽथभार्गवे। ब्राह्मणाः क्षत्रियावैश्या स्तेजोयुक्ता सहस्रशः॥ The commentator has, नत्सस्यालर्कयितु पुत्रान्तरमाह वत्सभूमिरिति। भार्गवात् वत्सभ्रातुः। अङ्गिरसो गालवस्याङ्गिरसत्वात् भार्गवे विश्वामित्रस्य भार्गवत्वात्॥ 'Another son of Vatsa, the father of Alarka, is described, Vatsabhūmi. From Bhārgava, the brother of Vatsa. (They were) Aṅgirasas from Gālava belonging to that family (and were born) in the family of Bhṛgu from the descent of Viśvāmitra.' The interpretation is not very clear, but it authorises the notion above expressed, that Vatsa and Bharga, the sons of Pratarddana, are the founders of two races of Kṣatriya-Brāhmaṇas.

17. On the subject of note 12 some further illustration is derivable from the Mahābhārata, Śānti Parva, Dāna-dharma. Haryaśva, the king of the Kāśīs, reigning between the Ganges and the Yamunā or in the Doab, was invaded and slain by the Haihayas, a race descended, according to this authority; from Śaryāti, the son of Manu (see Bk. IV. Ch. III). Sudeva, the son of Haryaśva, was also attacked and defeated by the same enemies. Divodāsa, his son, built and fortified Banārasa as a defence against the Haihayas, but in vain, for they took it and compelled him to fly. He sought refuge with Bharadvāja, by whose favour he had a son born to him, Pratarddana, who destroyed the Haihayas under their king Vītihavya and re-established the kingdom of Kāśī. Vītihavya, through the protection of Bhṛgu, became a Brāhmaṇa. The Mahābhārata gives a list of his descendants, which contains several of the names of the Kaśya dynasty of the text; thus, Ghṛtsamada is said to be his son and the two last of the line are Śunaka and Śaunaka. See supra, n. 7.

(रजेर्दैत्यानाञ्च युद्धम्, क्षत्रवृद्धस्य वंशावलिकथनञ्च)

पराशर उवाच

Raji had five hundred sons, all of unequalled daring and vigour. Upon the occurrence of a war between the demons and the gods, both parties inquired of Brahmā which would be victorious. The deity replied, "That for which Raji shall take up arms." Accordingly the Daityas immediately repaired to Raji, to secure his alliance; which he promised them, if they would make him their Indra after defeating the gods. To this they answered and said, "We cannot profess one thing and mean another; our Indra is Prahlāda and it is for him that we wage war." Having thus spoken, they departed; and the gods then came to him on the like errand. He proposed to them the said conditions and they agreed that he should be their Indra.

Raji therefore joined the heavenly host and by his numerous and formidable weapons destroyed the army of their enemies. When the demons were discomfited, Indra placed the feet of Raji upon his head and said, "You have preserved me from a great danger and I acknowledge you as my father; you are the sovereign chief over all the regions and I, the Indra of the three spheres, am your son."

The Rājā smiled and said, "Even be it so. The regard that is conciliated by many agreeable speeches is not to be resisted even when such language proceeds from a foe (much less should the kind words of a friend fail to win our affection)." He accordingly returned to his own city and Indra remained as his deputy in the government of heaven.

When Raji ascended to the skies, his sons, at the instigation of Nārada, demanded the rank of Indra as their hereditary right; and as the deity refused to acknowledge their supremacy, they reduced him to submission by force and usurped his station. After some considerable time had elapsed, the god of a hundred sacrifices, Indra, deprived of his share of offerings to the immortals, met Bṛhaspati in a retired place and said to him, "Cannot you give me a little of the sacrificial butter, even if it were no bigger than a jujube, for I am in want of sustenance?" "If," replied Bṛhaspati, "I had been applied to by you before, I could have done anything for you that you wished; as it is, I will endeavour and restore you in a few days to your sovereignty." So saying, he commenced a sacrifice for the purpose of increasing the might of Indra and of leading the sons of Raji into error and so effecting their downfall.[1]

Misled by their mental fascination, the princes became enemies of the Brāhmaṇas, regardless of their duties and contemners of the precepts of the Vedas; and thus devoid of morality and religion, they were slain by Indra, who by the assistance of the priest of the gods resumed his place in heaven. Whoever hears this story shall retain forever his proper place and never be guilty of wicked acts.

Rambha, the third son of Āyus, had no progeny.[2] Kṣatravṛddha had a son named Pratikṣatra[3]; his son was Sañjaya; his son was Vijaya;[4] his son was Yajñakrit;[5] his son was Harṣavarddhana;[6] his son was Sahadeva; his son was Adīna;[7] his son was Jayasena; his son was Sankṛti; his son was Kṣatradharman.[8]

These were the descendants of Kṣatravṛddha. I will now mention those of Nahuṣa.

NOTES

1. The Matsya says he taught the sons of Raji the Jinadharma or Jain religion : जिनधर्म्मं समास्थाय वेदवाह्यं स वेदवित्।

2. The Bhāgavata enumerates however, as his descendants, Rabhasa, Gambhīra and Akriya, whose posterity became Brāhmaṇas. The same authority gives as the descendants of Anenas the fourth son of Āyus, Śuddha, Śuci, Trikakud and Śāntākhya.

3. The Vāyu agrees with our text in making Pratipakṣa (Pratikṣatra) the son of Kṣattravṛddha; but the Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa consider Anenas to be the head of this branch of the posterity of Āyus. The Bhāgavata substitutes Kuśa, the Leśa of our text, the grandson of Kṣatravṛddha, for the first name; and this seems most likely to be correct. Although the different MSS, agree in reading क्षत्रवृद्धसुतः it should be perhaps क्षात्रवृद्ध। the patronymic Kṣātravṛddha; making then, as the Bhāgavata does, Pratikṣatra the son of Kṣ atravṛddha.

4. Jaya : Bhāgavata, Vāyu.

5. Vijaya : Vāyu, Kṛta : Bhāgavata.

6. Haryaśva : Brahma, Hari Vaṁśa Haryavana : Bhāgavata.

7. The last of the list : Vāyu, Ahīna : Bhāgavata.

8. Kṣatravṛddha : Brahma, Hari Vaṁśa.

Yati, Yayāti, Sanyāti, Ayāti, Viyati and Kṛti were the six valiant sons of Nahuṣa.[1] Yati declined the sovereignty[2] and Yayāti therefore succeeded to the throne. He had two wives, Devayānī, the daughter of Uśaṇas and Śarmiṣṭhā, the daughter of Vṛṣaparvan; of whom this genealogical verse is recited : "Devayānī bore two sons, Yadu and Turvasu. Śarmiṣṭhā, the daughter of Vṛṣaparvan, had three sons, Druhyu, Anu and Puru."[3] Through the curse of Uśanas, Yayāti became old and infirm before his time; but having appeased his father-in-law, he obtained permission to transfer his decrepitude to any one who would consent to take it. He first applied to his eldest son Yadu, and said, "Your maternal grandfather has brought this premature decay upon me; by his permission, however, I may transfer it to you for a thousand years. I am not yet satiate with worldly enjoyments and wish to partake of them through the means of your youth. Do not refuse compliance with my request." Yadu, however, was not willing to take upon him his father's decay; on which his father denounced an imprecation upon him and said, "Your posterity shall not possess dominion."

He then applied successively to Druhyu, Turvasu and Anu and demanded of them their juvenile vigour. They all refused and were in consequence cursed by the king. Lastly he made the same request of Śarmiṣṭhā's youngest son, Puru, who bowed to his father and readily consented to give him his youth and receive in exchange Yayāti's infirmities, saying that his father had conferred upon him a great favour.

The king Yayāti being thus endowed with renovated youth, conducted the affairs of state for the good of his people, enjoying such pleasures as were suited to his age and strength and were not incompatible with virtue. He formed a connection with the celestial nymph Viśvācī and was wholly attached to her and conccivcd no end to his desires.

The more they were gratified, the more ardent they became; as it is said in this verse, "Desire is not appeased by enjoyment; fire fed with sacrificial oil becomes but the more intense. No one has ever more than enough of rice or barley or gold or cattle, or women; abandon therefore inordinate desire. When a mind finds neither good nor ill in all objects, but looks on all with an equal eye, then everything yields it pleasure. The wise man is filled with happiness, who escapes from desire, which the feeble-minded can with difficulty relinquish an which grows not old with the aged. The hair becomes grey, the teeth fall out, as man advances in years; but the love of wealth, the love of life, are not impaired by age."

"A thousand years have passed," reflected Yayāti, "and my mind is still devoted to pleasure; every day my desires are awakened by new objects. I will therefore now renounce all sensual enjoyment and fix my mind upon spiritual truth. Unaffected by the alternatives of pleasure and pain and having nothing I may call my own, I will henceforth roam the forests with the deer."

Having made this determination, Yayāti restored his youth to Puru, resumed his own decrepitude, installed his youngest son in the sovercignty and departed to the wood of penance (Tapovana).[4] To Turvasu he consigned hc south-east districts of his kingdom; the west to Druhyu; the south to Yadu; and the north to Anu; to govern as viceroys under their younger brother Puru, whom he appointed supreme monarch of the earth.[5]

NOTES

1. The Bhāgavata refers briefly to the story of Nahuṣa which is told in the Mahābhārata more than once, in the Vana Parva, Udyoga Parva, Dāna Dharma Parva and others; also in the Padma and other Purāṇas. He had obtained the rank of Indra; but in his pride or at the suggestion of Śacī, compelling the Ṛṣis to bear his litter, he was cursed by them to fall from his state and reappear upon earth as a serpent. From this form he was set free by philosophical discussions with Yudhiṣṭhira and received final liberation. Much speculation, wholly unfounded, has been started by Wilford's conjecture that the name of this prince, with Deva, 'divine', prefixed, a combination which never occurs, was the same as Dionysius or Bacchus. Authorities generally agree as to the names of the first three of his sons : in those of the others there is much variety and the Matsya, Agni and Padma have seven names, as follows omitting the three first of the text :

Matsya	Agni	Padma	Liṅga
Udbhava	Udbhava	Udbhava	Śaryāti
Panści	Pañcaka	Pava	Campaka
Sunyāti	Pālaka	Viyāti	Andhaka
Meghayāti	Megha	Meghayāti

2. Or, as his name implies (यति), he became a devotee, a Yati : Bhāgavata.

3. The story is told in great detail in the Ādi Parvan of the Mahābhārata, also in the Bhāgavata, with some additions evidently of a recent taste. Śarmiṣṭhā, the daughter of Vṛṣaparvan, king of the Daityas, preceptor of the same race), had her thrown into a well. Yayāti, hunting in the forest, found her and taking her to her father, with his consent espoused her. Devayānī, in resentment of Śarmiṣṭhā's treatment, demanded that she should become her handmaid; and Vṛṣaparvan, afraid of Śukra's displeasure, was compelled to comply. In the service of his queen, however, Yayāti beheld Śarmiṣṭhā and secretly wedded her. Devayānī complaining to her father of Yayāti's infidelity, Śukra inflicted on him premature decay, with permission to transfer it to any one willing to give him youth and strength in exchange, as is related in the text. The passage specifying the sons of Yayāti is precisely the same in the Mahābhārata as in our text and is introduced in the same way : अत्रानुवंशश्लोको भवति। यदुं चतुर्वसं चैव देवयानी व्याजायत। दुह्यु चानुं पुरुं च शर्म्मिष्ठा वार्षपर्व्वणी॥

4. Bhṛgutuṅga, according to the Brahma.

5. The elder brothers were made Maṇḍala-nṛpas, kings of circles or districts : Bhāgavata. The situation of their governments is not exactly agreed upon.

	Vāyu and Padma	Brahmaand Hari Vaṁśa	Bhāgavata
Turvasu	South-east	South-east	West
Druhyu	West	West	South-east
Yadu	South-west	South	South
Anu	North	North	North

The Liṅga describes the ministers and people as expostulating with Yayāti, for illegally giving the supremacy to the youngest son; but he satisfies them by showing that he was justified in setting the seniors aside, for want of filial duty. The Mahābhārata, Udyoga Parva Gālava Caritra, has a legend of Yayāti's giving a daughter to the saint Gālava, who through her means obtains from different princes eight hundred horses, white with one black ear, as a fee for his preceptor Viśvāmitra. Yayāti, after his death and residence in Indra's heaven, is again descending to earth, when his daughter's sons give him the benefit of their devotions and replace him in the celestial sphere. It has the air of an old story. A legend in some respects similar has been related in our text, Bk. IV, Ch. VII.

I will first relate to you the family of Yadu, the eldest son of Yayāti, in which the eternal immutable Viṣṇu descended upon earth in a portion of his essence;[1] of which the glory cannot be described, though forever hymned in order to confer the fruit of all their wishes–whether they desired virtue, wealth, pleasure or liberation–upon all created beings, upon men, saints, heavenly quiristers, spirits of evil, nymphs, centaurs, serpents, birds, demons, gods, sages, Brāhmaṇas and ascetics. Whoever hears the account of the race of Yadu shall be released from all sin; for the supreme spirit, that is without form and which is called Viṣṇu, was manifested in this family.

Yadu had four sons, Sahasrajit, Kroṣṭi, Nala and Raghu.[2] Śatajit was the son of the elder of these and he had three sons, Haihaya, Veṇu[3] and Haya. The son of Haihaya was Dharmanetra[4]; his son was Kuṇṭi[5]; his son was Sāhanji[6]; his son was Mahiṣmat[7]; his son was Bhadrasena[8]; his son was Durddama; his son was Dhanaka[9], who had four sons, Kṛtavīrya, Kṛtāgni, Kṛtavarman and Kṛtaujas. Kṛtavīrya's son was Arjuna, the sovereign of the seven Dvīpas, the lord of a thousand arms. This prince propitiated the sage Dattātreya, the descendant of Atri, who was a portion of Viṣṇu and solicited and obtained from him these boons– a thousand arms; never acting unjustly; subjugation of the world by justice and protecting it equitably; victory over his enemies; and death by the hands of a person renowned in the three regions of the universe. With these means he ruled over the whole earth with might and justice and offered ten thousand sacrifices. Of him this verse is still recited : "The kings of the earth will assuredly never pursue his steps in sacrifice, in munificence, in devotion, in courtesy and in self-control." In his reign nothing was lost or injured; and so he governed the whole earth with undiminished health, prosperity, power and might, for eighty-five thousand years. While sporting in the waters of the Narmadā and elevated with wine, Rāvaṇa came on his tour of triumph to the city Māhīṣmatī and there he who boasted of overthrowing the gods, the Daityas, the Gandharvas and their king, was taken prisoner by Kārttavīrya and confined like a tame beast in a corner of his capital.[10]

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे एकादशः अध्यायः॥

At the expiration of his long reign Kārttavīrya was killed by Paraśurāma, who was an embodied portion of the mighty Nārāyaṇa.[11] Of the hundred sons of this king, the five principal were Śūra[12], Śūrasena, Vṛṣ aṇa[13], Madhu[14] and Jayadhvaja.[15] The son of the last was Tālajaṅgha, who had a hundred sons, called after him Tālajaṅghas : the eldest of these was Vītihotra; another was Bharata[16], who had two sons, Vṛṣa and Sujātī[17]. The son of Vṛṣa was Madhu[18]; he had a hundred sons, the chief of whom was Vṛṣṇi and from him the family obtained the name of Vṛṣṇi[19]. From the name of their father, Madhu, they were also called Mādhavas; while from the denomination of their common ancestor Yadu, the whole were termed Yādavas.[20]

NOTES

1. Or, 'in which Kṛṣṇa was born.' It might have been expected, from the importance of this genealogy, that it would have been so carefully preserved, that the authorities would have closely concurred in its details. Although, however, the leading specifications coincide, yet, as we shall have occasion to notice, great and irreconcilable variations occur.

2. The two first generally agree. There are differences in the rest; as

Vāyu	Brahma	Bhāgavata	Kūrma
Nīla	Nala	Nala	Nīla
Ajita	Anjika	Aripu	Jina
Raghu	Payoda		Raghu

The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa read Sahasrāda for the first name; and the Liṅga has Balasani in place of Nala. The Agni makes Śatajit also a son of Yadu.

3. Veṇuhaya : Bhāgavata. Uttānahaya : Padma. Veṭṭahaya : Matsya. They were the sons of Sahasrāda : Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa.

4. Dharmatantra : Vāyu, Dharma : Kūrma.

5. Kīrtti : Vāyu.

6. Sanjneya : Vāyu. Saṅkana : Agni. Sahañja of Sahanjani pura : Brahma. Sanjnita : Liṅga. Sanhana : Matsya. Sohañji : Bhāgavata.

7. By whom the city of Māhiśmatī on the Narbadda was founded : Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa.

8. So the Bhāgavata; but the Vāyu, more correctly, has Bhadraśreṇya. See Bk. IV. Ch. VIII. n. 12.

9. Kanaka : Vāyu. Varaka : Liṅga. Andhaka : Kūrma.

10. According to the Vāyu, Kārttavīrya was the aggressor, invading Laṅkā and there taking Rāvaṇa prisoner. The circumstances are more usually narrated as in our text.

11. See Bk. IV. Ch. VII. Kārttavīrya's fate was the consequence of an imprecation denounced by Āpava or Vasiṣṭha, the son of Varuṇa, whose hermitage had been burnt, according to the Mahābhārata, Rājadharma, by Citrabhānu or Fire, to whom the king had in his bounty presented the world. The Vāyu makes the king himself the incendiary, with arrows given him by Sūrya to dry up the ocean.

12. Urjjita : Bhāgavata.

13. Vṛṣabha : Bhāgavata. Dhṛṣṭa : Matsya, Dhṛṣ ṇa : Kūrma. Pṛṣokta : Padma, Vṛṣṇi : Liṅga. Kṛṣ ṇākṣa : Brahma.

14. Kṛṣṇa, in all except the Bhāgavata.

15. King of Avanti : Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa.

16. Ananta : Vāyu and Agni; elsewhere omitted.

17. Durjaya only : Vāyu, Matsya.

18. This Madhu, according to the Bhāgavata, was the son of Kārttavīrya. The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa make him the son of Vṛṣa, but do not say whose son Vṛṣa was. The commentator on the latter asserts that the name is a synonym of Payoda, the son of Yadu, according to his authority and to that alone.

19. The Bhāgavata agrees with our text, but the Brahma, Hari Vaṁśa, Liṅga and Kūrma make Vṛṣ aṇa the son of Madhu and derive the family name of Vṛṣṇis or Vārṣṇeyas from him.

20. The text takes no notice of some collateral tribes, which appear to merit remark. Most of the other authorities, in mentioning the sons of Jayadhvaja, observe that from them came the five great divisions of the Haihaya tribe. These, according to the Vāyu, were the Tālajaṅghas, Vītihotras, Āvantyas, Tuṇḍikeras and Jātas. The Matsya and Agni omit the first and substitute Bhojas; and the latter are included in the list in the Brahma, Padma, Liṅga and Hari Vaṁśa. For Jātas the reading is Sañjātas or Sujātas. The Brahma Purāṇa has also Bhāratas, who, as well as the Sujātas, are not commonly specified, it is said, 'from their great number.' They are in all probability invented by the compiler out of the names of the text, Bharata and Sujāti. The situation of these tribes is central India, for the capital of the Tālajaṅghas was Māhiśmatī or Culī-Maheśvara, still called, according to Tod, Shasra-bāhukibasti, 'the village of the thousand-armed;' that is, of Kārttavīrya. Annals of Rajasthan, I. 39. n. The Tuṇḍikeras and Vītihotras are placed in the geographical lists behind the Vindhyan mountains and the termination-kaira is common in the valley of the Narmadā, as Bairkaira or we may nave Tuṇḍikera abbreviated, as Tuṇḍari on the Tapti. The Āvantyas were in Ujjayin and the Bhojas were in the neighbourhood probably of Dhār in Malva. These tribes must have preceded, then, the Rajput tribes, by whom these countries are now occupied or Rathores, Chauhans, Pawars, Ghelotes and the rest. There are still some vestiges of them and a tribe of Haihayas still exists, at the top of the valley of Sohagpur in Bhagel-khaṇḍa, aware of their ancient lineage and though few in number, celebrated for their valour. Tod's Rajasthan, I. 39. The scope of the traditions regarding them, especially of their overrunning the country, along with Śakas and other foreign tribes, in the reign preceding that of Sagara (see Bk. IV, Ch. III), indicates their foreign origin also; and if we might trust to verbal resemblances, we might suspect that the Hayas and Haihayas of the Hindus had some connection with the Hia, Hoiei-ke, Hoiei-hu and similarly denominated Hun or Turk tribes, who make a figure in Chinese history. Des Guignes, Histoire des Huns, I.7, 55, 231, II. 253. At the same time it is to be observed that these tribes do not make their appearance until some centuries after the Christian era and the scene of their first exploits is far from the frontiers of India : the coincidence of appellation may be therefore merely accidental. In the word Haya, which properly means 'a horse,' it is not impossible, however, that we have a confirmatory evidence of the Scythian origin of the Haihayas, as Tod supposed; although we cannot with him imagine the word 'horse' itself is derived form haya. Rajasthan, I. 76.

CHAPTER 12
द्वादशोऽध्यायः

(यदुपुत्रक्रोष्टुवंशकथनम्)

पराशर उवाच

क्रोष्टुश्च यदुपुत्रस्यात्मजो वृजिनीवान् । ततश्च स्वाहिः, ततो रुषद्गुः, रुषद्रोश्चित्ररथः, तत्तनयः शशविन्दुचतुर्दश-महारत्नशचक्रवर्त्यभवत्॥ १॥

Kroṣṭri, the son of Yadu,[1] had a son named Vrijinīvat[2]; his son was Svāhī[3]; his son was Ruṣardru[4]; his son was Citraratha; his son was Śaṣavindu, who was lord of the fourteen great gems[5]; he had a hundred thousand wives and a million of sons.[6] The most renowned of them were Pṛthuyaṣas, Pṛthukarman, Pṛthujaya, Pṛthukīrtti, Pṛthudāna and Pṛdhuṣravas. The son of the last of these six[7] was Tamas[8]; his son was Uṣaṇas[9], who celebrated a hundred sacrifices of the horse; his son was Śiteyus[10]; his son was Rukmakavaca[11]; his son was Parāvṛt, who had five sons, Rukmeṣu, Pṛthurukman, Jyāmagha, Pālita and Harita.[12] To this day the following verse relating to Jyāmagha is repeated :

भार्यावशास्तु ये केचिद् भविष्यन्तथवा मृताः।
तेषान्तु ज्यामघः श्रेष्ठ शैव्यापतिरभून्नृपः॥
अपुत्रा तस्य सा पत्नी शैव्या नाम तथाप्यसौ।
अपत्यकामोऽपि भयान्नान्यां भार्य्यामविन्दत॥

"Of all the husbands submissive to their wives, who have been or who will be, the most eminent is the king Jyāmagha[13], who was the husband of Śaivyā." Śaivyā was barren; but Jyāmagha was so much afraid of her, that he did not take any other wife.

तस्मिंश्च विद्रुतेऽतित्रासाल्लोलायतलोचनयुगलं त्राहि तात भ्रातरित्याकुल विलापविधुरं राजकन्यारत्नमद्राक्षीत्॥ ४॥

On one occasion the king, after a desperate conflict with elephants and horscs, defeated a powerful foe, who abandoning wife, children, kin, army, treasure and dominion fled. When the enemy was put to flight, Jyāmagha beheld a lovely princess left alone and exclaiming, "Save me, father! Save me, brother!" as her large eyes rolled widely with affright.

तद्दर्शनाच्च तस्यामनुरागानुगतान्तरात्म स भूपोऽचिन्तयत्॥ ५॥

तथैव देव्याहमनुज्ञातः समुद्वक्ष्यामिति। अथैनां रथमारोप्य स्वनगरमागच्छत्॥ ७॥

The king was struck by her beauty and penetrated with affection for her and said to himself, "This is fortunate; I have no children and am the husband of a sterile bride; this maiden has fallen into my hands to rear up to me posterity : I will espouse her; but first I will take her in my car and convey her to my palace, where I must request the concurrence of the queen in these nuptials." Accordingly he took the princes into his chariot and rcturned to his own capital.

When Jyāmagha's approach was announced, Śaivyā came to the palace gate, attended by the ministers, the courtiers and the citizens, to welcome the victorious monarch; but when she beheld the maiden standing on the left hand of the king, her lips swelled and slightly quivered with resentment and she said to Jyāmagha, "Who is this light-hearted damsel that is with you in the chariot?" The king unprepared with a reply, made answer precipitately, through fear of his queen; "This is my daughter-in-law."

"I have never had a son, rejoined Śaivyā, "and you have no other children. Of what son of yours then is this girl the wife?" The king disconcerted by the jealousy and anger which the words of Śaivyā displayed, made this reply to her in order to prevent further contention; "She is the young bride of the future son whom you shall bring forth." Hearing this, Śaivyā smiled gently and said, "So be it;" and the king entered into his great palace.

In consequence of this conversation regarding the birth of a son having taken place in an auspicious conjunction, aspect and season, the queen, although passed the time of women, became shortly afterwards pregnant and bore a son. His father named hım Vijarbha and married him to the damsel, he had brought home.

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे द्वादशः अध्यायः॥

They had three sons, Kratha, Kaiśika[14] and Romapāda[15]. The son of Romapāda was Babhru[16] and his son was Dhṛti[17]. The son of Kaiśika was Cedi, whose descendants were called the Caidya kings[18]. The son of Kratha was Kunti[19]; his son was Vṛṣṇi[20]; his son was Nirvṛti[21]; his son was Daśārha; his son was Vyoman; his son was Jīmūta; his son was Vikṛti[22]; his son was Bhīmaratha; his son was Navaratha[23]; his son was Daśaratha[24]; his son was Śakuni; his son was Karambhi; his son was Devarāta; his son was Devakṣatra[25]; his son was Madhu[26]; his son was Anavaratha; his son was Kuruvatsa; his son was Anuratha; his son was Puruhotra; his son was Aṅśu; his son was Satvata, from whom the princes of this house were termed Sātvatas. This was the progeny of Jyāmagha; by listening to the account of whom, a man is purified from his sons.

NOTES

1. In the Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa we have two families from Kroṣṭri; one which is much the same as that of the text; the other makes short work of a long story, as we shall again notice.

2. Vajravat : Kūrma.

3. Śānti : Kūrma. Svāhā : Matsya. Triśaṅku : Liṅga.

4. Viṣāṇsu : Agni. Ṛṣabha : Liṅga. Kuśika : Kūrma. Ruśeku : Bhāgavata.

5. Or articles the best of their kind; seven animate and seven inanimate; a wife, a priest, a general, a charioteer, a horse, an elephant and a body of foot soldiers; or instead of the last three, an executioner, an economist, a reader of the Vedas; and a chariot, an umbrella, a jewel, a sword, a shield, a banner and a treasure.

6. The text states this in plain prose, but the Vāyu quotes a verse which makes out but a hundred hundred or 10,000 sons : श्लोकोयं गीतः पुराविदैः। शशविब्दोस्तुपुत्राणां शतानामभवच्छतं। धीमतामनुरूपानां भूरिद्रविणतेजसां॥

7. The Matsya has the first, third and fifth of our text and Pṛthudharma, Pṛthukīrtti and Pṛthumat. The Kūrma has also six names, but makes as many successions.

8. Suyajña : Agni, Brahma, Matsya. Dharma : Bhāgavata.

9. Uṣat : Brahma, Hari Vaṁśa.

10. Śitīkṣu : Agni. Śineyus : Brahma. Purujit : Bhāgavata. The Vāyu has Maruta and Kambalavarhiṣ, brothers, instead.

11. Considerable variety prevails here. The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa have Marutta the Rājarṣi (a gross blunder, see Bk. Ch. IV. Ch. I), Kambalavarhiṣ, Śataprasūti, Rukmakavaca : the Agni-Marutta, Kambalavarhiṣ, Rukmeṣu : while the Bhāgavata makes Rucaka son of Uśanas and father to the five princes who in the text are the grandsons of Rukmakavaca.

12. The Bhāgavata has Rukmeṣu, Rukman, Jyāmagha, Pṛthu and Purujit. The Vāyu reads the two last names Parigha and Hari. The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa insert Parajit as the father of the five named as in the text.

13. Most of the other authorities mention that the elder of the five brothers, Rukmeṣu, succeeded his father in the sovereignty; and that the second, Pṛhurukman, remained in his brother's service. Pālita and Harita were set over Videha (विदेहेषु पितान्यसत्। Liṅga) or Tirhut and Jyāmagha went forth to settle where he might : according to the Vāyu he conquered Madhyadeśa (the country along the Narmadā), Mekalā and the Śuktimat mountains. So the Brahma Purāṇa states that he established himself along the Rikṣavat mountain and dwelt in Śuktimati. He names his son, as we shall, see Vidarbha : the country so called is Berar and amongst his descendants we have the Caidyas or princes of Boghelkhaṇḍa and Chandail and Dasārha, more correctly perhaps Dasarṇa, Chhattisghar; so that this story of Jyāmagha's adventures appears to allude to the first settlement of the Yādava tribes along the Narmadā more to the south and west than before.

14. The Bhāgavata has Kuśa; the Matsya, Kauśika : all the authorities agree in specifying three sons.

15. Lomapāda : Agni.

16. Vastu : Vāyu. Kṛti : Agni.

17. Āhuti : Vāyu. Iti : Padma. Dyuti : Matsya. Bhṛti : Kūrma. This latter is singular in carrying on the line of Romapāda for twelve generations further.

18. The Bhāgavata, however, makes the princes of Cedi continuous from Romapāda; as, Babhru, Dhṛti, Uśīka, Cedi - the Caidyas, amongst whom were Damaghoṣa and Śiśupāla.

19. Kumbhī : Padma.

20. Dhṛṣṭa : Vāyu. Dhṛṣṭi : Matsya.

21. Nivṛtti : Vāyu. Nidhṛti : Agni. The Brahma makes three sons, Avanta, Daśārha and Balivṛṣ ahan. In the Liṅga it is said of Daśārha that he was ताम्रारिगण सूदनः। 'destroyer of the host of copper (faced; European?) foes.'

22. Vikala : Matsya.

23. Nararatha : Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa.

24. Dṛḍharatha : Agni. Devarāta : Liṅga.

25. Soma : Liṅga. Devanakṣatra : Padma.

26. There is great vareity in the succeeding appellations :

Bhāgavata	Vāyu	Brahma	Matsya	Padma	Kūrma
Madhu	Madhu	Madhu	Madhu	Madhu	Madhu
Kuruvaśa	Manu	Manavaśas	Uruvas	Puru	Kuru
Anu	Puruvatsa	Purudvat	Purudvat	Punarvasu	Anu
Puruhotra	Purudvat	Madhu and Satva	Jantu	Jantu	Aṅśa
Āyu	Satva
Satvata	Satvata	Satvata	Satvata	Satvata	Andhaka Satvata

The Liṅga has Puruṣaprabhu, Manvat, Pratarddana, Satvata; and the Agni, Dravavasu, Puruhuta, Jantu and Sātvata. Some of these originate, no doubt, in the blunders of copyists, but they cannot all be referred to that source.

The sons of Satvata were Bhajina, Bhajamāna, Divya, Andhaka, Devāvṛddha, Mahābhoja and Vṛṣṇi[1]. Bhajamāna had three sons Nimi[2], Krikaṇa[3] and Vṛṣṇi[4], by one wife and as many by another, Satrājit, Shasrajit and Ayutajit[5]. The son of Devāvṛddha was Babhru of whom this verse is recited : "We hear when afar and we behold when nigh, that Babhru is the first of men and Devāvṛddha is equal to the gods; sixty-six persons following the precepts of one and six thousand and eight who were disciples of the other, obtained immortality." Mahābhoja was a pious prince; his descendants were the Bhojas, the princes of Mrittikāvatī[6], then called Mārttikāvatas[7]. Vṛṣṇi had two sons, Sumitra and Yudhājit[8]; from the former Anamitra and Śini were born[9]. The son of Anamitra was Nighna, who had two sons, Prasena and Satrājit. The divine Āditya, the sun, was the friend of the latter.

On one occasion Satrājit, while walking along the sea shore, addressed his mind to Sūrya and hymned his praises; on which the divinity appeared and stood before him. Bcholding him in an indistinct shape, Satrājit said to the sun, "I have beheld you, lord, in the heavens as a globe of fire : now do you show favour unto me, that I may see you in your proper form." On this the sun taking the jewel called Syamantaka from off his neck, placed it apart and Satrājit beheld him of a dwarfish stature, with a body like burnished copper and with slightly reddish eyes. Having offered his adorations, the sun desired him to demand a boon and he requested that the jewel might become his. The sun presented it to him and then resumed his place in the sky. Having obtained the spotless gem of gems, Satrājit wore it on his neck and becoming as brilliant thereby as the sun himself, irradiating all the region with his splendour, he returned to Dvārakā. The inhabitants of that city, beholding him approach, repaired to the eternal male, Puruṣottama, who, to sustain the burden of the earth, had assumed a mortal form (as Kṛṣṇa) and said to him, "Lord, assuredly the divine sun is coming to visit you." But Kṛṣṇa smiled and said, "It is not the divine sun, but Satrājit, to whom Āditya has presented the Syamantaka gem and he now wears it; go and behold him without apprehension." Accordingly they departed. Satrājit having gone to his house, there deposited the jewel, which yielded daily eight loads of gold and through its marvellous virtue dispelled all fear of portents, wild beasts, fire, robbers and famine.

Acyuta was of opinion that this wonderful gem should be in the possession of Ugrasena; but although he had the power of taking it from Satrājit, he did not deprive him of it, that he might not occasion any disagreement amongst the family. Satrājit, on the other hand, fearing that Kṛṣṇa would ask him for the jewel, transferred it to his brother Prasena. Now it was the peculiar property of this jewel, that although it was an inexhaustible source of good to a virtuous person, yet when worn by a man of bad character it was the cause of his death. Prasena having taken the gem and hung it round his neck, mounted his horse and went to the woods to hunt. In the chase he was killed by lion. The lion, taking the jewel in his mouth, was about to depart, when he was observed and killed by Jāmbavant, the king of the bears, who carrying off the gem retired into his cave and gave it to his son Sukumāra to play with.

When some time had elapsed and Prasena did not appear, the Yādavas began to whisper one to another and to say, "This is Kṛṣṇa's doing; desirous of the jewel and not obtaining it, he has perpetrated the murder of Prasena in order to get it into his possession."

When these calumnious rumours came to the knowledge of Kṛṣṇa, he collected a number of the Yādavas and accompanied by them pursued the course of Prasena by the impressions of his horse's hoofs. Ascertaining by this means that he and his horse had been killed by a lion, he was acquitted by all the people of any share in his death. Desirous of recovering the gem he then followed the steps of the lion and at no great distance came to the place where the lion had been killed by the bear. Following the foot-marks of the latter, he arrived at the foot of a mountain, where he desired the Yādavas to await him, while he continued the track. Still guided by the marks of the feet, he discovered a cavern and had scarcely entered it, when he heard the nurse of Sukumāra saying to him,

"The lion killed Prasena; the lion has been killed by Jāmbavant : weep not, Sukumāra, the Syamantaka is your own." Thus assured of his object, Kṛṣṇa advanced into the cavern and saw the brilliant jewel in the hands of the nurse, who was giving it as a play thing to Sukumāra. The nurse soon descried his approach and marking his eyes fixed upon the gem with eager desire, called loudly for help. Hearing her cries, Jāmbavant, full of anger, came to the cave and a conflict ensued between him and Acyuta, which lasted twenty-one days. The Yādavas who had accompanied the latter waited seven or eight days in expectation of his return, but as the foe of Madhu still came out forth, they concluded that he must have met his death in the cavern. "It could not have required so many days," they thought "to overcome an enemy;" and accordingly they departed and returned to Dvārakā and announced that Kṛṣṇa had been killed.

When the relations of Acyuta heard this intelligence, they performed all the obsequial rites suited to the occasion. The food and water thus offered to Kṛṣṇa in the celebration of his Śrāddha served to support his life and invigorate his strength in the combat in which he was engaged; while his adversary, wearied by daily conflict with a powerful foe, bruised and battered in every limb by heavy blows and enfeebled by want of food, became unable longer to resist him. Overcome by his mighty antagonist, Jāmbavant cast himself before him and said, "You, mighty being, are surely invincible by all the demons and by the spirits of heaven, earth or hell; much less are you to be vanquished by mean and powers creatures in a human shape; and still less by such as we are, who are born of brute origin. Undoubtedly you are a portion of my sovereign lord Nārāyaṇa, the defender of the universe." Thus addressed by Jāmbavant, Kṛṣṇa explained to him fully that he had descended to take upon himself the burden of the earth and kindly alleviated the bodily pain which the bear suffered from the fight, by touching him with his hand, Jāmbavant again prostrated himself before Kṛṣṇa and presented to him his daughter Jāmbavantī, as an offering suitable to a guest. He also delivered to his visitor the Syamantaka jewel. Although a gift from such an individual was not fit for his acceptance, yet Kṛṣṇa took the gem for the purpose of clearing his reputation.

He then returned along with his bride Jāmbavantī to Dvārakā. When the people of Dvārakā beheld Kṛṣṇa alive and returned, they were filled with delight, so that those who were bowed down with years recovered youthful vigour; and all the Yādavas, men and women, assembled round Ānakadundubhi, the father of the hero and congratulated him. Kṛṣṇa related to the whole assembly of the Yādavas all that had happened, exactly as it had befallen and restoring the Syamantaka jewel to Satrājit was exonerated from the crime of which he had been falsely accused. He then led Jāmbavantī into the inner apartments.

When Satrājit reflected that he had been the cause of the aspersions upon Kṛṣṇa's character, he felt alarmed and to conciliate the prince he gave him to wife his daughter Satyabhāmā.

The maiden had been previously sought in marriage by several of the most distinguished Yādavas, as Akrūra, Kṛtavarman and Śatadhanvan, who were highly incensed at her being wedded to another and leagued in enmity against Satrājit. The chief amongst them, with Akrūra and Kṛtavarman, said to Śatadhanvan, "This caitiff Satrājit has offered a gross insult to you, as well as to us who solicited his daughter, by giving her to Kṛṣṇa : let him not live : why do you not kill him and take the jewel? Should Acyuta therefore enter into feud with you, we will take your part."

Upon this promise Śatadhanvan undertook to slay Satrājit. When news arrived that the sons of Pāṇḍu had been burned in the house of wax[10], Kṛṣṇa who knew the real truth, set off for Vāraṇāvata to allay the animosity of Duryodhana and to perform the duties his relationship required. Śatadhanvan taking advantage of his absence, killed Satrājit in his sleep and took possession of the gem. Upon this coming to the knowledge of Satyabhāmā, she immediately mounted her chariot and filled with fury at her father's murder, repaired to Bāraṇāvata and told her husband how Satrājit had been killed by Śatadhanvan in resentment of her having been married to another and how he had carried off the jewel; and she implored him to take prompt measures to avenge such heinous wrong. Kṛṣṇa, who is ever internally placid, being informed of these transactions, said to Satyabhāmā, as his eyes flashed with indignation. "These are indeed audacious injuries, but I will not submit to them from so vile a wretch. They must assail the tree, who would kill the birds that there have built their nests. Dismiss excessive sorrow; it needs not your lamentations to excite any wrath." Returning forthwith to Dvārakā, Kṛṣṇa took Baladeva apart and said to him, "A lion slew Prasena, hunting in the forests; and now Satrājit has been murdered by Śatadhanvan. As both these are removed, the jewel which belonged to them is our common right. Up then, ascend your car and put Śatadhanvan to death."

Being thus excited by his brother, Balarāma engaged resolutely in the enterprise; but Śatadhanvan, being aware of their hostile designs, repaired to Kṛtavarman and required his assistance. Kṛtavarman, however, declined to assist him, pleading his inability to engage in a conflict with both Baladeva and Kṛṣṇa, Śatadhanwan thus disappointed, applied to Akrūra; but he said, "You must have recourse to some other protector. How should I be able to defend you? There is no one even amongst the immortals, whose praises are celebrated throughout the universe, who is capable of contending with the wielder of the discus, at the stamp of whose foot the three worlds tremble; whose hand makes the wives of the Asuras widows, whose weapons no host, however mighty, can resist : no one is capable of encountering the wielder of the ploughshare, who annihilates the prowess of his enemies by the glances of his eyes, that roll with the joys of wine; and whose vast ploughshare manifests his might, by seizing and exterminating the most formidable foes." "Since this is the case," replied Śatadhanvan, "and you are unable to assist me, at least accept and take care of this jewel." "I will do so," answered Akrūra, "if you promise that even in the last extremity you will not divulge its being in my possession." To this Śatadhanwan agreed and Akrūra took the jewel; and other former mounting a very swift mare, one that could travel a hundred leagues a day, fled from Dvārakā. When Kṛṣṇa heard of Śatadhanvan's flight, he harness his four horses, Śaivya, Sugrīva, Meghapuṣpa and Balāhaka, to his car and accompanied by Balarāma, set off in pursuit.

The mare held her speed and accomplished her hundred leagues; but when she reached the country of Mithilā, her strength was exhausted and she dropped down and died. Śatadhanwan[11] dismounting, continued his flight on foot. When his pursuers came to the place where the mare had perished, Kṛṣṇa said to Balarāma, "Do you remain in the car, while I follow the villain on foot and put him to death; the ground here is bad; and the horses will not be able to drag the chariot across it." Balarāma accordingly stayed with the car and Kṛṣṇa followed Śatadhanvan on foot; when he had chased him for two kosa, he discharged his discus and although Śatadhanwan was at a considerable distance, the weapon struck off his head. Kṛṣṇa then coming up, searched his body and his dress for the Syamantaka jewel, but found it not. He then returned to Balabhadra and told him that they had effected the death of Śatadhanvan to no purpose, for the precious gem, the quintessence of all worlds, was not upon his person. When Balabhadra heard this, he flew into a violent rage and said to Vāsudeva, "Shame light upon you, to be thus greedy of wealth! I acknowledge no brotherhood with you. Here lies my path. Go whither you please; I have done with Dvārakā, with you, with all our house. It is of no use to seek to impose upon me with your perjuries." Thus reviling his brother, who fruitlessly endeavoured to appease him, Balabhadra went to the city of Videha, where Janaka[12] received him hospitably and there he remained. Vāsudeva returned to Dvārakā. It was during his stay in the dwelling of Janaka that Duryodhana, the son of Dhṛtarāṣṭra, learned from Balabhadra the art of fighting with the mace. At the expiration of three years, Ugrasena and other chiefs of the Yādavas, being satisfied that Kṛṣṇa had not the jewel, went to Videha and removed Balabhadra's suspicions and brought him home.

Akrūra, carefully considering the treasures which the precious jewel secured to him, constantly celebrated religious rites and purified with holy prayer[13], lived in affluence for fifty-two years; and through the virtue of that gem there was no dearth nor pestilence in the whole country.[14] At the end of that period, Śatrughna, the great grandson of Satvata, was killed by the Bhojas and as they were in bonds of alliance with Akrūra, he accompanied them in their flight from Dvārakā.

On this Andhaka, one of the elders of the Yadu race, thus spoke : "Wherever Śvaphalka; the father of Akrūra, dwelt, there famine, plague, dearth and other visitations were unknown.

Once when there was want of rain in the kingdom of Kāśīrājā, Śvaphalka was brought there and immediately there fell rain from the heavens. It happened also that the queen of Kāśīrājā conceived and was quick with a daughter; but when the time of delivery arrived, the child issued not from the womb. Twelve years passed away and still the girl was unborn. Then Kāśīrājā spoke to the child and said, 'Daughter, why is your birth thus delayed? Come forth; I desire to behold you, why do you inflict this protracted suffering upon your mother?' Thus addressed, the infant answered, 'if, father, you will present a cow every day to the Brāhmaṇas, I shall at the end of three years more be born.' The king accordingly presented daily a cow to the Brāhmaṇas and at the end of three years the damsel came into the world. Her father called her Gāndini and the subsequently gave her to Śvaphalka, when he came to his palace for his benefit. Gāndinī, as long as she lived, gave a cow to the Brāhmaṇas every day. Akrūra was her son by Śvaphalka and his birth therefore proceeds from a combination of uncommon excellence.

When a person such as he is, is absent from us, it is likely that famine, pestilence and prodigies should fail to occur? Let him then be invited to return : the faults of men of exalted worth must not be too severely scrutinised."

Agreeably to the advice of Andhaka the elder, the Yādavas sent a mission, headed by Keśava, Ugrasena and Balabhadra, to assure Akrūra that no notice would be taken of any irregularity committed by him; and having satisfied him that he was in no danger, they brought him back to Dvārakā. Immediately on his arrival, in consequence of the properties of the jewel, the plague, dearth, famine and every other calamity and portent, ceased. Kṛṣṇa, observing this, reflected[15] that the descent of Akrūra from Gāndinī and Śvaphalka was a cause wholly disproportionate to such an effect and that some powerful influence must be exerted to arrest pestilence and famine. "Of a surety," said he to himself, "the great Syamantaka jewel is in his keeping, for such I have heard are amongst its properties. This Akrūra too has been lately celebrating sacrifice after sacrifice; his own means are insufficient for such expenses; it is beyond a doubt that he has the jewel." Having come to this conclusion, he called a meeting of all the Yādavas at his house, under the pretext of some festive celebration. When they were all seated and the purpose of their assembling had been explained and the business accomplished, Kṛṣṇa entered into conversation with Akrūra and after laughing and joking, said to him, " Kinsman, you are a very prince in your liberality; but we know very well that the precious jewel which was stolen by Sudhanvan was delivered by him to you and is now in your possession, to the great benefit of this kingdom. So let it remain; we all derive advantage from its virtues. But Balabhadra suspects that I have it and therefore, out of kindness to me, show it to the assembly." When Akrūra, who had the jewel with him, was thus taxed, he hesitated what he should do. "If I deny that I have the jewel," thought he, "they will search my person and find the gem hidden amongst my clothes. I cannot submit to a search." So reflecting, Akrūra said to Nārāyaṇa, the cause of the whole world, "It is true that the Syamantaka jewel was entrusted to me by Śatadhanvan, when he went from hence. I expected every day that you would ask me for it and with much inconvenience therefore I have kept it until now. The charge of it has subjected me to so much anxiety, that I have been incapable of enjoying any pleasure and have never known a moment's ease. Afraid that you would think me unfit to retain possession of a jewel so essential to the welfare of the kingdom, I forbore to mention to you its being in my hands; but now take it yourself and give the care of it to whom you please." Having thus spoken, Akrūra drew forth from his garments a small gold box and took from it the jewel. On displaying it to the assembly of the Yādavas, the whole chamber where they sat was illuminated by its radiance.

अथाहाक्रूरः,-एष मणिर्यः शतधन्वनास्माकं समर्पितः यस्यायं, स एनं गृह्णात्विति। तन्मणिरत्नमालोक्य सर्वयादवानां साधु साध्विति विस्मितमनसां वाचाऽश्रूयन्त। तमालोक्य ममायमुच्युतेनैव सामान्यः समन्विच्छित इति बलभद्रः सस्पृहोऽभवत्॥ ६५॥

ममैवेदं पितृधनमित्यतीव च सत्यभामापि स्पृहयाञ्चकार। बल-सत्यानना-वलोकनात् कृष्णोऽप्यात्मानं चक्रान्तरावस्थित-मिव मेने॥ ६६॥

सकलयादवसमक्षञ्चाक्रूरमाह, -एतद्धि मणिरत्नमात्म-शोधनायैषां यदूनां दर्शितम्। एतच्च मम बलभद्रस्य तच्च सामान्यं, पितृधनञ्चैतत् सत्यभामाया नान्यस्य॥ ६७॥

एतच्च सर्वकालं शुचिना ब्रह्मचर्यगुणवता ध्रियमाणमशेषराष्ट्रस्योपकारकम्, अशुचिना ध्रियमाण-माधारमेव हन्ति॥ ६८॥

"This", said Akrūra, "is the Syamantaka gem, which was consigned to me by Śatadhanvan : let him to whom it belongs now take it." When the Yādavas beheld the jewel, they were filled with astonishment and loudly expressed their delight. Balabhadra immediately claimed the jewel as his property jointly with Acyuta, as formerly agreed upon; while Satyabhāmā demanded it as her right, as it had originally belonged to her father.

Between these two Kṛṣṇa considered himself as an ox between the two wheels of a cart and thus spoke to Akrūra in the presence of all the Yādavas : "This jewel has been exhibited to the assembly in order to clear my reputation; it is the joint right of Balabhadra and myself and is the patrimonial inheritance of Satyabhāmā. But this jewel, to be of advantage to the whole kingdom, should be taken charge of by a person who leads a life of perpetual continence : If worn by an impure individual, it will be the cause of his death.

कथञ्चैतत्, सत्यभामा स्वीकरोतु? आर्य्येण बलभद्रेणापि मदिरापानाद्यशेषोपभोगपरित्यागः कथं कार्यः। तदयं यदुलोकोऽयं बलभद्रोऽहं सत्या च त्वां दानपते! प्रार्थयामः, एतद् भवानेव धारयितं समर्थः, त्वत्स्थञ्चास्य राष्ट्रस्योपकारकं, तद्भवानशेषराष्ट्रोपकारनिमित्तमेतत् पूर्ववद् धारयतु। त्वयान्यथा न वक्तव्यमित्युक्ते दानपतिस्तथेत्युक्त्वा जग्राह तन्महामणिरत्नम्। ततः प्रभृति चाक्रूरः प्रकटेनैवातीव तेजसा जाज्वल्यमानेनात्मकण्ठासक्तेनादित्य इवांशुमाली चचार॥७०॥

Now as I have sixteen thousand wives, I am not qualified to have the care of it. It is not likely that Satyabhāmā will agree to the conditions that would entitle her to the possession of the jewel; and as to Balabhadra, he is too much addicted to wine and the pleasures of sense to lead a life of self-denial. We are therefore out of the question and all the Yādavas, Balabhadra, Satyabhāmā and myself, request you, most bountiful Akrūra, to retain the care of the jewel, as you have done hitherto, for the general good; for you are qualified to have the keeping of it and in your hands it has been productive of benefit to the country. You must not decline compliance with our request." Akrūra, thus urged, accepted the jewel and thenceforth wore it publicly round his neck, where it shone with dazzling brightness; and Akrūra moved about like the sun, wearing a garland of light.

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे त्रयोदशः अध्यायः॥

He who calls to mind the vindication of the character of Kṛṣṇa from false aspersions, shall never become the subject of unfounded accusation in the least degree and living in the full exercise of his sense shall be cleansed from every sin.[16]

NOTES

1. The Agni acknowledges but four sons, but all the rest agree in the number and mostly in the names. Mahābhoja is sometimes read Mahābhāga.

2. Kṛmi : Brahma, Agni, Kūrma.

3. Panava : Vāyu. Kramana : Brahma. Kṛpaṇa : Padma. Kinkiṇa : Bhāgavata.

4. Dhṛṣṭhi : Bhāgavata, Brahma.

5. The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa add to the first three Śūra and Purañjaya and to the second Dāsaka.

6. By the Parṇāśā river : Brahma Purāṇa : a river in Malva.

7. These are made incorrectly the descendants of Babhru in the Hari Vaṁśa.

8. The Bhāgavata, Matsya and Vāyu agree in the main, as to the genealogy that follows, with our text. The Vāyu states that Vṛṣṇi had two wives, Mādrī and Gāndhārī by the former he had Yudhājit and Anamitra and by the latter Sumitra and Devamīḍhuṣa. The Matsya also names the ladies, but gives Sumitra to Gāndhārī and makes Mādrī the mother of Yudhājit, Devamīḍhuṣa, Anamitra and Śini. The Agni has a similar arrangement, but substitutes Dhṛṣṭa for Vṛṣṇi and makes him the fifteenth in descent from Satvata. The Liṅga, Padma, Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa have made great confusion by altering, apparently without any warrant, the name of Vṛṣṇi of Kroṣṭri.

9. The Bhāgavata makes them sons of Yudhājit; the Matsya and Agni, as observed in the preceding note, his brothers as well as Sumitra's.

10. This alludes to events detailed in the Mahābhārata.

11. The Vāyu calls Sudhanvan or Śatadhanvan king of Mithilā.

12. A rather violent anachronism to make Janaka contemporary with Balarāma.

13. The text gives the commencement of the prayer, but commentator does not say whence it is taken : सवनगतौ क्षत्रियवैश्यौ निघ्नन् ब्रह्महा भगवति। 'Oh, goddess! The murderer of a Kṣatriya or Vaiśya, engaged in religious duties, is the slayer of a Brāhmaṇa;' i.e. the crime is equally heinous. Perhaps the last word should be भवति 'is'.

14. Some of the circumstances of this marvellous gem seem to identify it with a stone of widely diffused celebrity in the East and which, according to the Mohamedan writers, was given originally by Noah to Japhet; the Hijer al mattyr of the Arabs, Sang yeddat of the Persians and Jeddah tash of the Turks, the possession of which secures rain and fertility. The author of the Habib-us-Sier gravely asserts that this stone was in the hands of the Mongols in his day or in the tenth century.

15. Kṛṣṇa's reflecting, the commentator observes, is to be understood of him only as consistent with the account here given of him, as if he were a mere man; for, as he was omniscient, there was no occasion for him to reflect or reason. Kṛṣṇa however appears in this story in a very different light from that in which he is usually represented; and the adventure, it may be remarked, is detached from the place in which we might have expected to find it, the narrative of his life, which forms the subject of the next book.

16. The story of the Syamantaka gem occurs in the Bhāgavata. Vāyu, Matsya, Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa and is alluded to in other Purāṇas. It may be considered as one common to the whole series. Independently of the part borne in it by Kṛṣṇa, it presents a curious and no doubt a faithful picture of ancient manners, in the loose self-government of a kindred clan, in the acts of personal violence which are committed, in the feuds which ensue, in the public meetings which are held and the part that is taken by the elders and by the women in all the proceedings of the community.

चतुर्दशः अध्यायः

(अनमित्रान्धकयोर्वंशवर्णनम्)

पराशर उवाच

The younger brother of Anamitra was Śini; his son was Satyaka; his son was Yuyudhāna, also known by the name of Sātyaki; his son was Asaṅga; his son was Tūni;[1] his son was Yugandhara.[2] These princes were termed Śaineyas.

In the family of Anamitra, Pṛśni was born; his son was Śvaphalka,[3] the sanctity of whose character has been described : the younger brother of Śvaphalka was named Citraka.

Śvaphalka had by Gāndini, besides Akrūra, Upamadgu, Mṛdura, Śārimejaya, Giri, Kṣatropakṣatra. Śatrughna, Arimarddana, Dharmadhris, Dhṛṣṭasarman, Gandhamojavāha and Prativāha. He had also a daughter, Sutārā.[4]

Devavat and Upadeva were the sons of Akrūra. The sons of Citrika were Pṛthu and Vipritha and many others.[5] Andhaka had four sons, Kukkura, Bhajamāna, Śuci,[6] Kambalavarhiṣa. The son of Kukkura was Vṛṣṭa;[7] his son was Kapotaroman; his son was Viloman;[8] his son was Bhava;[9] who was also called Candanodakadundubhi;[10] he was a friend of the Gandharva Tumburu; his son was Abhijit, his son was Punarvasu; his son was Āhuka and he had also a daughter named Āhukī. The sons of Āhuka were Devaka and Ugrasena. The former had four sons, Devavat, Ūpadeva, Sudeva and Devarakṣita and seven daughters, Vṛkadevā, Upadevā, Devarakṣitā, Śrīdevā, Śāntidevā, Sahadevā and Devakī : all the daughters were married to Vasudeva. The sons of Ugrasena were Kaṅsa, Nyagrodha, Sunāman, Kaṅka, Śaṅku, Subhūmi, Rāṣṭrapāla, Yuddhamuṣṭhī and Tuṣṭimat; and his daughters were Kansā, Kansavatī, Sutanu, Rāṣṭrapālī and Kaṅkī.

The son of Bhajamāna[11] was Vidūratha; his son was Śūra; his son was Śamin;[12] his son was Pratikṣatra;[13] his son was Svayambhoja;[14] his son was Hridika, who had Kṛtavarman, Śatadhanu, Devamīdhuṣa and others.[15] Śūra, the son of Devamīdhuṣa,[16] was married to Mārisā and had by her ten sons. On the birth of Vasudeva, who was one of these sons, the gods, to whom the future is manifest, foresaw that the divine being would take a human form in his family and thereupon they sounded with joy the drums of heaven; from this circumstance Vasudeva was also called Ānakadundubhi.[17] His brothers were Devabhāga, Devaśravas, Anādhṛṣṭi, Karundhaka, Vatsabālaka, Sṛñjaya, Śyāma, Śamīka and Gaṇḍūṣa; and his sisters were Pṛthā, Śrutadevā, Śrutakīrtti, Śrutaśravas and Rājādhidevī. Śūra had a friend named Kuntibhoja, to whom, as he had no children, he presented in due from his daughter Pṛthā. She was married to Pāṇḍu and bore him Yudhiṣṭhira, Bhīma and Arjuna, who were in fact the sons of the deities Dharma, Vāyu (air) and Indra. While she was yet unmarried, also, she had a son named Karṇa, begotten by the divine Āditya (the sun).

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे चतुर्दशः अध्यायः।

Pāṇḍu had another wife, named Mādrī who had by the twin sons of Āditya, Nāsatya and Dasra, two sons, Nakula and Sahadeva.[18]

Śrutadevā was married to the Kāruṣa prince Vṛddhaśarman and bore him the fierce Asura Dantavaktra. Dhṛṣṭaketu, Rājā of Kaikeya,[19] married Śrutakīrtti and had by her Santarddana and four other sons, known as the five Kaikeyas. Jayasena, king of Avantī, married Rājādhidevī and had Vinda and Anuvinda. Śrutaśravas was wedded to Damaghoṣa, Rājā of Cedi and bore him Śiśupāla.[20] This prince was in a former existence the unrighteous but valiant monarch of the Daityas, Hiraṇyakaśipu, who was killed by the divine guardian of creation (in the man-lion Avatāra). He was next the ten-headed sovereign Rāvaṇa, whose unequalled prowess, strength and power were overcome by the lord of the three worlds, Rāma. Having been killed by the deity in the form of Rāghava, he had long enjoyed the reward of his virtues in exemption from an embodied state, but had now received birth once more as Śiśupāla, the son of Damaghoṣa, king of Cedi. In this character he renewed, with greater inveteracy than ever, his hostile hatred towards the god surnamed Puṇḍarīkākṣ a, a portion of the supreme being, who had descended to lighten the burdens of the earth; and was in consequence slain by him : but from the circumstance of his thoughts being constantly engrossed by the supreme being, Śiśupāla was united with him after death; for the lord give to those to whom he is favourable whatever they desire and he bestows a heavenly and exalted even upon those whom he slays in his displeasure.

NOTES

1. Bhūti : Vāyu. Kuni : Bhāgavata. Dyumni : Matsya.

2. The Agni makes these all brother's sons of Satyaka and adds another, Ṛṣabha, the father of Śvaphalka.

3. The authorities are not agreed here. Śvaphalka, according to the Agni, as just remarked, comes from Śimi, the son of Anamitra. The Bhāgavata, instead of Pṛśni, has Vṛṣṇi, son of Anamitra; the Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa have Vṛṣṇi; and the Agni, Pṛṣṇi, son of Yudhājit. The Matsya also makes Yudhājit the ancestor of Akrūra, through Ṛṣabha and Jayanta. Yudhājit in the Brahma, is the son of Kroṣṭri.

4. The different authorities vary in the reading of these names, though they generally concur in the number.

5. The Matsya and Padma call them sons of Akrūra, but no doubt incorrectly.

6. Śami : Vāyu. Śaśi : Matsya. Śini : Agni. This last makes them the sons of Babhru and calls the first Sundara.

7. Vṛṣṇi : Bhāgavata, Vāyu, Matsya, Dhṛṣṭa : Agni. Dhṛṣṇu : Brahma, Hari Vaṁśa.

8. The Bhāgavata puts Viloman first. The Liṅga makes it an epithet of Kapotaroman, saying he was Vilomaja, 'irregularly begotten.' In place of Viloman we have Raivata, Vāyu; Taittiri, Matsya; Tittiri, Agni.

9. Nava : Agni. Bala : Liṅga. Nala : Matsya. Tamas : Kūrma. Anu : Bhāgavata.

10. The Matsya, Vāyu and Agni agree with our text. The Liṅga, Padma and Kūrma read Ānakadundubhi as a synonym of Bala. The Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa have no such name, but here insert Punarvasu, son of Taittiri. The Bhāgavata has a different series or Anu, Andhaka, Dundubhi, Arijit, Punarvasu, Āhuka.

11. This Bhajamāna is the son of Andhaka, according to all the best authorities; so the Padma calls this branch the Andhakas. The Agni makes him the son of Babhru.

12. Vāta, Nivāta, Śamin : Vāyu.

13. Sonāśva : Matsya. Sonākṣa : Padma. Śini : Bhāgavata.

14. Bhojaka : Agni. Bhoja : Padma.

15. Ten sons : Matsya.

16. Devārha : Vāyu, Padma, Agni and Matsya; and a different series follows or Kambalavarhiṣa, Asamaujas, Samaujas, Sudanṣṭra, Suvaśa, Dhṛṣṭa, Anamitra, Nighna, Satrajit. They all make Vasudeva the son of Śūra, however; but the three first leave it doubtful whether that Śūra was the son of Bhajamāna or not. The Bhāgavata and Brahma agree with the text, which is probably correct. The Brahma has Śūra, son of Devamīḍhuṣa, although it does not specify the latter amongst the sons of Hridika.

17. Ānaka a larger and Dundubhi a smaller drum.

18. The Mahābhārata is the best authority for these circumstances.

19. The Padma calls him king of Kashmir.

20. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa make Śrutadevā mother of Śiśupāla and Pṛthukīrtti of Dantavaktra.

Maitreya said– Most eminent of all who cultivate Piety, I am curious to hear from you and you are able to explain to me, how it happened that the same being who when killed by Viṣṇu as Hiraṇyakaśipu and Rāvaṇa obtained enjoyments which, though scarcely attainable by the immortals, were but temporary, should have been absorbed into the eternal Hari when slain by him in the person of Śiśupāla.

Parāśara said– When the divine author of creation, preservation and destruction of the universe accomplished the death of Hiraṇyakaśipu, he assumed a body composed of the figures of a lion and a man, so that Hiraṇyakaśipu was not aware that his destroyer was Viṣṇu : although therefore the quality of purity, derived from exceeding merit, had been attained, yet his mind was perplexed by the predominance of the property of passion; and the consequence of that intermixture was, that he reaped, as the result of his death by the hands of Viṣṇu, only unlimited power and enjoyment upon earth, as Daśānana, the sovereign of the three spheres; he did not obtain absorption into the supreme spirit, that is without beginning or end because his mind was not wholly dedicated to that sole object. So also Daśānana being entirely subject to the passion of love and engrossed completely by the thoughts of Jānakī, could not comprehend that the son of Daśaratha whom he beheld was in reality the divine Acyuta. At the moment of his death he was impressed with the notion that his adversary was a mortal and therefore the fruit he derived from being slain by Viṣṇu was confined to his birth in the illustrious family of the kings of Cedi and the exercise of extensive dominion. In this situation many circumstances brought the names of Viṣṇu to his notice and on all these occasions the enmity that had accumulated through successive births influenced his mind; and in speaking constantly with disrespect of Acyuta, he was ever repeating his different appellations. Whether walling, eating, sitting or sleeping, his animosity was never at rest and Kṛṣṇa was ever present to his thoughts in his ordinary semblance, having eyes as beautiful as the leaf of the lotus, clad in bright yellow raiment, decorated with a garland, with bracelets on his arms and wrists and a diadem on his head; having four robust arms, bearing the conch, the disc, the mace and the lotus. Thus uttering his names, even though in malediction and dwelling upon his image, though in enmity, he beheld Kṛṣṇa, when inflicting his death, radiant with resplendent weapons, bright with ineffable splendour in his own essence as the supreme being and all his passion and hatred ceased and he was purified from every defect. Being killed by the discus of Viṣṇu at the instant he thus meditated, all his sins were consumed by his divine adversary and he was blended with him by whose might he had been slain. I have thus replied to your inquiries. He by whom the divine Viṣṇu is named or called to recollection, even in enmity, obtains a reward that is difficult of attainment to the demons and the gods : how much greater shall be his recompense who glorifies the deity in fervour and in faith!

Vasudeva, also called Ānakadundubhi, had Rohiṇī, Pauravī,[1] Bhadrā, Madirā, Devakī and several other wives. His sons by Rohiṇī were Balabhadra, Sāraṇa, Śaru, Durmada and others. Balabhadra espoused Revatī and had by her Nisaṭha and Ulmuka. The sons of Sāraṇa were Mārṣṭi, Mārṣṭimat, Śiśu, Satyadhṛti and others. Bhadrāśva, Bhadrabāhu, Durgama, Bhūta and others, were born in the family of Rohiṇī (of the race of Puru). The sons of Vasudeva by Madirā were Nanda, Upananda, Krītaka and others. Bhadrā bore him Upanidhi, Gada and others. By his wife Vaiśālī he had one son named Kauśika. Devakī bore him six sons, Kīrttimat, Suṣeṇa, Udāyin, Bhadrasena, Rijudāsa and Bhadradeha; all of whom Kaṅsa put to death.[2]

When Devakī was pregnant the seventh time, Yoganidrā (the sleep of devotion), sent by Viṣṇu, extricated the embryo from its maternal womb at midnight and transferred it to that of Rohiṇī; and from having been thus taken away, the child (who was Balarāma) received the name of Saṅkarṣaṇa. Next, the divine Viṣṇu himself, the root of the vast universal tree, inscrutable by the understandings of all gods, demons, sages and men, past, present or to come, adored by Brahmā and all the deities, he who is without beginning, middle or end, being moved to relieve the earth of her load, descended into the womb of Devakī and was born as her son Vāsudeva. Yoganidrā, proud to execute his orders, removed the embryo to Yaśodā, the wife of Nanda the cowherd.

At his birth the earth was relieved from all iniquity; the sun, moon and planets shone with unclouded splendour; all fear of calamitous portents was dispelled; and universal happiness prevailed.

From the moment he appeared, all mankind were led into the righteous path in him. While this powerful being resided in this world of mortals, he had sixteen thousand and one hundred wives; of these the principal were Rukmiṇī, Satyabhāmā, Jāmbavantī, Jātahaśinī and four others. By these the universal form, who is without beginning, begot a hundred and eighty thousand sons, of whom thirteen are most renowned, Pradyumna, Carudeṣṇa, Sāmba and others. Pradyumna married Kakudvatī, the daughter of Rukmin and had by her Aniruddha. Aniruddha married Subhadrā, the grand-daughter of the same Rukmin and she bore him a son named Vajra. The son of Vajra was Bāhu; and his son was Sucāru.[3]

In this manner the descendants of Yadu multiplied and there were many hundreds of thousands of them, so that it would be impossible to repeat their names in hundreds of years. Two verses relating to them are current; the domestic instructors of the boys in the use of arms amounted to three crores and eighty lacs (or thirty-eight millions). Who shall enumerate the whole of the mighty men of the Yādava race, who were tens of ten thousands and hundreds of hundred thousands in number?" Those powerful Daityas who were killed in the conflicts between them and the gods were born again upon earth as men, as tyrants and oppressors; and in order to check their violence, the gods also descended to the world of mortals and became members of the hundred and one branches of the family of Yadu. Viṣṇu was to them a teacher and a ruler and all the Yādavas were obedient to his commands.

Whoever listens frequently to this account of the origin of the heroes of the race of Vṛṣṇi, shall be purified from all sins and obtain the sphere of Viṣṇu.

NOTES

1. Pauravī is rather a title attached to a second Rohiṇī, to distinguish her from the first, the mother of Balarāma : she is also said by the Vāyu to be the daughter of Bāhlīka.

2. The enumeration of our text is rather imperfect. The Vāyu names the wives of Vasudeva, Pauravī, Rohiṇī, Madirā, Rudrā, Vaiśākhī, Devakī; and adds two bond-maids, Sugandhī and Vanarajī. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa name twelve wives and two slaves; Rohiṇī, Madirā, Vaiśākhī, Bhadrā, Sunāmnī, Sahadevā, Śāntidevā, Śrīdevā, Devarakṣitā, Vṛkadevī, Upadevī, Devakī; and Śāntanu and Bāravā. The children of the two slaves, according to the Vāyu, were Puṇḍra, who became a king and Kapila, who retired to the woods. In the Bhāgavata we have thirteen wives, Pauravī, Rohiṇī, Bhadrā, Madirā, Rocanā, Ilā, Devakī, Dhṛtadevī, Śāntidevā, Upadevī, Śrīdevā, Devarakṣitā and Sahadevā : the last seven in this and the preceding list are the daughters of Devaka.

3. The wives and children of Kṛṣṇa are more particularly described in the next book. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa add some details of the descendants of Vasudeva's brothers : thus Devabhāga is said to be the father of Uddhava; Anadhṛṣṭi of Devaśravas, a great scholar or Paṇḍit. Devaśravas, another brother of Vasudeva, had Śatrughna and another son called Ekalavya, who for some cause being exposed when an infant, was found and brought up by the Niṣādas and was then termed Niṣādin, Vatsavat (Vatsabālaka) and Gaṇḍūṣa being childless, Vasudeva gave his son Kauśika to be adopted by the former and Kṛṣṇa gave Cārudeṣṇa and three others to the latter. Kanaka (Karundhakā) had two sons, Tantrija and Tantripāla. Avākṣrinjima (Sṛñjaya) had also two, Vīra and Aśvahanu. The gracious Śamīka became as the son (although the brother) of Śyāma and disdaining the joint rule which the princes of the house of Bhoja exercised, made himself paramount. Yudhiṣṭhira was his friend. The extravagant numbers of the Yādavas merely indicate that they were, as they undoubtedly were, a powerful and numerous tribe, of whom many traces exist in various parts of India.

षोडशोऽध्यायः

(तुर्वसुवंशकथनम्)

पराशर उवाच

इत्येष समासतस्ते कथितः तुर्वसोर्वंशमवधारय॥ १॥

तुर्वसोर्वह्निरात्मजः वह्नेर्गोभानुः, ततश्च त्रैशाम्बः, तस्माच्च करन्धमः, तस्मादपि मरुतः सोऽनपत्योऽभवत्। ततश्च पौरवं दुष्मन्तं पुत्रमकल्पयत्स एवं ययातिशापात् तद्वंशः पौरवं वंशमाश्रितवान्॥ २॥

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे षोडशः अध्यायः॥

Parāśara said– I shall now summarily give you an account of the descendants of Turvasu.

The son of Turvasu was Vahni;[1] his son was Gobhānu;[2] his son was Traiśāmba;[3] his son was Karandhama; his son was Marutta. Marutta had no children and he therefore adopted Duṣyanta, of the family of Puru; by which the line of Turvasu merged into that of Puru.[4] This took place in consequence of the malediction denounced on his son by Yayāti.[5]

NOTES

1. Varga : Agni.

2. Bhānumat : Bhāgavata, which also inserts Bhaga before him.

3. Tribhānu : Vāyu. Triśānu : Brahma. Traisāli : Agni. Trīśāri : Matsya.

4. Besides Bharata, who, as will be hereafter seen, was the son of Duṣyanta, the Vāyu, Matsya, Agni and Brahma Purāṇas enumerate several descendants in this line, for the purpose evidently of introducing, as the posterity of Turvasu, the nations of the south of India : the series is Varuttha, (Karutthāma, Brahma), Āndīra (Ākrīra, Brahma); whose sons are Pāṇḍya, Karaṭa, Cola, Kerala; the Hari Vaṁśa adds Kola and the Agni very incorrectly Gandhāra.

5. The curse alluded to is the failure of his line (Prajāsamuccheda), denounced upon Turvasu as the punishment of refusing to take his father's infirmities upon him (see Bk. IV. Ch. XI). He was also sentenced to rule over savages and barbarians, Mlecchas or people not Hindus. The Mahābhārata adds that thc Yavanas sprang from Turvasu. As sovereign of the south-east, he should be the ancestor of the people of Arakan, Ava; but the authorities cited in the preceding note refer the nations of the Peninsula to him and consequently consider them as Mlecchas; and these and similar passages indicate a period prior to the introduction of Hinduism into the south of India.

The son of Druhyu was Babhru; his son was Setu; his son was Āradvat;[1] his son was Gāndhāra;[2] his son was Dharma;[3] his son was Dhṛita;[4] his son was Duryāman;[5] his son was Pracetas, who had a hundred sons and they were the princes of the lawless Mlecchas or barbarians of the north.[6]

NOTES

1. Also Āraddha in MSS., and Āraṭṭa, Matsya, which last seems to be the preferable reading. The Vāyu has Āruddha; the Brahma, Angārasetu; but Āraṭṭa is a northern country, contiguous to or synonymous with, Gāndhāra.

2. Of Gāndhāra it is said in the Vāyu that it is a large country named after him and is famous for its breed of horses : ख्यायते तस्य नाम्ना तु गान्धारविषयो महान्। गान्धार देशजाश्चापि तुरगा वाजिनां वराः॥ The Matsya reads the beginning of the second line, आरट्टदेशजातास्तु। showing that Āraṭṭa and Gāndhāra are much the same. See Bk. II. Ch. III. n.83.

3. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa, in opposition to all the rest, make Dharma and his successors the descendants of Anu.

4. Ghṛta : Agni.

5. Durddama : Vāyu and Bhāgavata. The Matsya, Brahma and Agni insert a Vidupa, Duduha or Vidula, before Pracetas.

6. So the Bhāgavata and Matsya. The Mahābhārata says the descendants of Durhya are the Vaibhojas, a people unacquainted with the use of cars or beasts of burden and who travel on rafts : they have no kings.

Uśīnara had five sons, Śivi, Tṛṇa,[5] Gara,[6] Kṛmi, Dārvan.[7] Śivi had four sons, Vṛṣadarbha, Suvīra, Kaikeya and Madra.[8] Titikṣu had one son, Uṣadratha;[9] his son was Hema;[10] his son was Sutapas; his son was Bali, on whose wife five sons were begotten by Dīrghatamas or Aṅga, Baṅga, Kaliṅga, Suhma and Puṇḍra;[11] and their descendants and the five countries they inhabited, were known by the same names.[12]

The son of Aṅga was Pāra;[13] his son was Divaratha; his son was Dharmaratha;[14] his son was Citraratha; his son was Romapāda,[15] also called Daśaratha, to whom, being childless, Daśaratha, the son of Aja, gave his daughter Śāntā to be adopted.[16] After this, Romapāda had a son named Caturaṅga; his son was Pṛthulākṣa; his son was Campa, who founded the city of Campā.[17] The son of Campa was Haryyaṅga; his son was Bhadraratha, who had two sons, Vṛhatkarman and Vṛhadratha. The son of the first was Vṛhadbhānu;[18] his son was Vṛihanmanas; his son was Jayadratha, who, by a wife who was the daughter of a Kṣatriya father and Brāhmaṇī mother, had a son named Vijaya;[19] his son was Dhṛti; his son was Dhṛtavrata; his son was Satyakarman; his son was Adhiratha[20] who found Karṇa in a basket on the banks of the Ganges, where he had been exposed by his mother, Pṛthā. The son of Karṇa was Vṛṣasena.[21] These were the Aṅga kings. You shall next hear who were the descendants of Puru.

NOTES

1. By some unaccountable caprice the Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa, unsupported by any other authority, here substitute for Anu the name of Kakṣeyu, a descendant of Puru and transfer the whole series of his posterity to the house of Puru.

2. Pakṣa and Parapakṣa : Vāyu. Parameśu : Matsya. Parokṣa : Bhāgavata.

3. Kālānala : Vāyu. Kolāhala : Matsya.

4. Mahāśāla : Agni. Mahāśīla : Bhāgavata.

5. Nṛga : Agni. Vana : Bhāgavata.

6. Nava : Matsya. Śama : Bhāgavata.

7. Vrata : Agni. Suvrata : Matsya. Dakṣa : Bhāgavata. According to the Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa the five sons of Uśīnara were the ancestors of different tribes. Śivi was the progenitor of the Śaivas; Nṛga of the Yaudheyas; Nava of the Navarāṣṭras; Vrata of the Āmbaṣṭhas; and Kṛmi founded the city Kṛmilā.

8. Bhadra and Bhadraka : Matsya, Agni. These sons of Śivi give name to different provinces and tribes in the west and north-west of India.

9. Ruṣadratha : Agni. Tuṣadratha : Matsya.

10. Pheṇa : Agni. Sena : Matsya.

11. Odra or in some copies Andhra : Bhāgavata.

12. See Bk. II. Ch. III. n. 3, 46, 49, 50 and 73. of Suhma it may be remarked, that it is specified in the Siddhānta Kaumudī as an example of Pāṇinī's rule; प्राचां नगरान्ते। 7.3.24; by which Nagara compounded with names of countries in the east becomes Nāgara, as Sauhmanāgara (सौह्मनागरः), 'produced, in a city of Suhma'. The descendants of Anu, according to the Mahābhārata were all Mlecchas. The last named work, as well as the Vāyu and Matsya Purāṇas, have an absurd story of the circumstances of the birth of Dīrghatamas, who was the son of Ujāsi or Utathya, the elder brother of Bṛhaspati by Mamatā and of his begetting Aṅga and the rest. They agree in assigning descendants of all four castes to them; the Vāyu stating that Bali had पुत्रान् चातुर्व्वर्ण्यकरान्। and the Matsya ascribing it to a boon given by Brahmā to Bali : चतुरो नियतान् वर्णान् त्वं स्थापयेति। 'Do you establish the four perpetual castes.' Of these, the Brāhmaṇas are known as Bāleyas : बालेषाः ब्राह्मणाश्चवै। The Matsya calls Bali, the son of Virocana and आयुकल्पप्रमाणिकः। 'existing for a whole Kalpa;' identifying him therefore, only in a different period and form, with the Bali of the Vāmana Avatāra.

13. Anāpāna : Vāyu. Khanāpāna : Bhāgavata, Adhivāhana : Agni. Dadhivahana : Matsya.

14. This prince is said in the Vāyu to have drunk the Soma juice along with Indra : येन विष्णुपदे गिरौ सोमः शक्रेणसह वै पीतो महात्मना।

15. The Matsya and Agni insert a Satyaratha.

16. This is noticed in the Rāmāyaṇa, in the story of the hermit Ṛṣyaśṛṅga, to whom Śāntā was given in marriage. Her adoptive father is called in the Rāmāyaṇa, as he is in the Agni and Matsya, Lomapāda : the meaning is the same, 'hairy foot.' Rāmāyaṇa, IX. X. See also Prelude to the Uttara Rāma Caritra, Hindu Theatre, I. 289.

17. The Bhāgavata differs here from all the other authorities in omitting Campā, the founder of Campāpurī, a city of which traces still remain in the vicinity of Bhagalpur, having inserted him previously amongst the descendants of Ikṣvāku (see Bk. IV. Ch. III. n. 12). Campā is every where recognised as the capital of Aṅga and the translators of the Rāmāyaṇa were very wide off the truth, when they conjectured that it might be Aṅgva or Ava.

18. Vṛhaddarbha : Brahma. The Bhāgavata omits the two successors of Campā and makes Vṛhadratha, Vṛhatkarman and Vṛhadbhānu, sons of Pṛthulākṣa.

19. The Vāyu, Matsya and Hari Vaṁśa make Vijaya the brother of Jayadratha. The Bhāgavata agrees with our text. The mother of Vijaya from her origin was of the Sūta caste, the genealogist and charioteer. Manu, X. 47. Her son was of the same caste, children taking the caste of the mother : consequently the descendants of Vijaya, kings of Aṅga, were Sūtas; and this explains the contemptuous application of the term Sūta to Karṇa, the half brother of the Pāṇḍus; for he, as will presently be mentioned, was adopted into the Aṅga family and succeeded to the crown.

20. Some variety prevails in the series of princes here, but this arises from not distinguishing the collateral lines, the descendants of Jayadratha from those of Vijaya. The Vāyu and Matsya give the latter as in our text, but they agree also with the Agni and Brahma in the successors of Jayadratha, as Dṛḍharatha or Vṛhadratha and Janamejaya or Viśvajit.

21. Sūrasena : Vāyu. Vikarṇa : Brahma.

The son of Puru was Janamejaya; his son was Prācinvat; his son was Pravīra; his son was Manasyu; his son was Bhayada;[1] his son was Sudyumna;[2] his son was Bahugava;[3] his son was Samyāti;[4] his son was Ahamyāti;[5] his son was Raudrāśva,[6] who had ten sons, Ṛteyu,[7] Kakṣeyu, Sthaṇḍileyu, Ghṛteyu, Jaleyu, Sthaleyu, Santateyu, Dhaneyu, Vaneyu and Vrateyu.[8] The son of Ṛteyu was Rantināra,[9] whose sons were Taṅsu, Apratīratha and Dhruva.[10] The son of the second of these was Kaṇva and his son was Medhātithi, from whom the Kāṇvāyāna Brahmanas[11] descended. Anila[12] was the son of Taṅsu and he had four sons of whom Duṣyanta was the elder.[13] The son of Duṣyanta was the emperor Bharata; a verse explanatory of his name is chanted by the gods; "The mother is only the receptacle; it is the father by whom a son is begotten. Cherish they son, Duṣyanta; treat not Śakuntalā with disrespect. Sons, who are born from the paternal loins, rescue their progenitors from the infernal regions. You are the parent of this boy; Śakuntalā has spoken truth." From the expression 'cherish', Bharasva, the prince was called Bharata.[14]

Bharata had by different wives nine sons, but they were put to death by their own mothers, because Bharata remarked that they bore no resemblance to him and the women were afraid that he would therefore desert them. The birth of his sons being thus unavailing, Bharata sacrificed to the Maruts and they gave him Bharadvāja, the son of Bṛhaspati by Mamatā the wife of Utathya, expelled by the kick of Dīrghatamas, his half brother, before his time. This verse explains the purport of his appellation; " 'Silly woman,' said Bṛhaspati, 'cherish this child of two fathers' (bhara dvā-jam). 'No, Bṛhaspati,' replied Mamatā, do you take care of him.' So saying, they both abandoned him; but from their expressions the boy was called Bharadvāja." He was also termed Vitatha, in allusion to the unprofitable (vitatha) birth of the sons of Bharata.[15] The son of Vitatha was Bhavanmanyu;[16] his sons were many and amongst them the chief were Vṛhatkṣatra, Mahāvīrya, Nara and Garga.[17] The son of Nara was Sankṛti; his sons were Ruciradhī and Rantideva.[18] The son of Garga was Śini;[19] and their descendants called Gārgyas and Śainyas, although Kṣatriyas by birth, became Brāhmaṇas.[20] The son of Mahāvīrya was Urukṣaya,[21] who had three sons, Trayyāruṇa, Puṣkarin and Kapi;[22] the last of whom became a Brāhaman. The son of Vṛhatkṣatra was Suhotra[23] , whose son was Hastin, who founded the city of Hastināpur.[24] The son of Hastin were Ajamīḍha,[25] Dvimīḍha and Purumīdha. One son of Ajamīḍha was Kaṇva, whose son was Medhātithi;[26] his other son was Bṛhadiṣu, whose son was Bṛhadvasu;[27] his son was Bṛhatkarman;[28] his son was Jayadratha;[29] his son was Viśvajit;[30] his son was Senajit, whose sons were Rucirāśva, Kāśya, Dṛḍhadhanuṣ and Vasahanu.[31] The son of Rucirāśva was Pṛthusena; his son was Pāra; his son was Nīpa; he had a hundred sons, of whom Samara, the principal, was the ruler of Kāmpilya.[32] Samara had three sons, Pāra, Sampāra, Sadaśva.

The son of Pāra was Pṛthu; his son was Sukṛti; his son was Vibhrātra;[33] his son was Anuha, who married Kṛtvī, the daughter of Śuka (the son of Vyāsa) and had by her Brahmadatta;[34] his son was Viśvaksena; his son was Udaksena;[35] and his son was Bhallāṭ a.[36]

The son of Dvimīḍha[37] was Yavīnara; his son was Dhṛtimat;[38] his son was Satyadhṛti; his son was Dṛdhanemi; his son was Supārśva;[39] his son was Sumati; his son was Sannatimat; his son was Kṛta, to whom Hiraṇyanābha taught the philosophy of the Yoga and he compiled twenty-four Saṁhitās (or compendia) for the use of the eastern Brāhmaṇas, who study the Sāmaveda.[40]

The son of Kṛta was Ugrāyudha, by whose prowess the Nīpa race of Kṣatriyas was destroyed;[41] his son was Kṣemya; his son was Suvīra, his son was Nṛpañjaya;[42] his son was Bahuratha. These were called Pauravas.

Ajamīḍha had a wife called Nīlinī and by her he had a son named Nīla; his son was Śānti; his son was Śuśānti; his son was Purujānu;[43] his son was Cakṣu;[44] his son was Haryyasva,[45] who had five sons, Mudgala, Sṛñjaya,[46] Vṛhadiṣu, Pravīra[47] and Kāmpilya.[48] Their father said, "These my five (pañca) sons are able (alam) to protect the countries;" and hence they were termed the Pāñcālas.[49] From Mudgala descended the Maudgalya Brāhmaṇas;[50] he had also a son named Bahvaśva,[51] who had two children, twins, a son and daughter, Divodāsa and Ahalyā. The son of Śatadvat of Gautama by Ahalyā was Śatānanda;[52] his son was Satyadhṛti, who was a proficient in military science. Being enamoured of the nymph Urvaśī, Satyadhṛti was the parent of two children, a boy and girl. Śāntanu, a Rājā, while hunting, found these children exposed in a clump of long Śara grass; and compassionating their condition, took them and brought them up. As they were nurtured through pity (kṛpā), they were called Kṛpa and Kṛpī. The latter became the wife of Droṇa and the mother of Asvatthāman.

The son of Divodāsa was Mitrayu;[53] his son was Cyavana; his son was Sudāsa; his son was Saudāsa, also called Sahadeva; his son was Somaka; he had a hundred sons, of whom Jantu was the eldest and Pṛṣata the youngest. The son of Pṛṣata was Drupada; his son was Dhṛṣṭadyumna; his son was Dṛṣṭaketu.

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे एकोनविंशः अध्यायः॥

Another son of Ajamīḍha was named Ṛkṣa;[54] his son was Samvaraṇa; his son was Kuru, who gave his name to the holy district Kurukṣetra; his sons were Sudhanuṣ, Jahnu, Parīkṣit and many others.[55] The son of Sudhanuṣ was Suhotra; his son was Cyavana; his son was Kṛtaka;[56] his son was Uparicara the Vasu,[57] who had seven children, Vṛhadratha, Pratyagra, Kuśāmba, Māvella, Matsya and others. The son of Vṛhadratha was Kuśāgra; his son was Ṛṣabha;[58] his son was Puṣpavat; his son was Satyadhṛta;[59] his son was Sudhanvan; and his son was Jantu. Vṛhadratha had another son, who being born in two parts, which were put together (sandhita) by a female fiend named Jatā, he was denominated Jarāsandha;[60] his son was Sahadeva; his son was Somāpi;[61] his son was Śrutaśravas.[62] These were kings of Magadha.

NOTES

1. Abhayada : Vāyu. Vītamaya : Agni. Vātāyudha : Matsya. Cārupāda : Bhāgavata. The Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva, p. 136, 138, has two accounts of the descendants of Puru, differing materially in the beginning from each other and from the lists of the Purāṇas. In the first, Pravīra is made the son of Puru; his son is Manasyu, who has three sons, Śakta, Sanhanana and Vāgmin; and there the line stops. Another son of Puru is Raudrāśva, whose sons are Riceyu and the rest, as in our text; making them the second in descent, instead of the eleventh. In the second list, the son of Puru is Janamejaya, whose successors are Prācinvat, Samyāti, Ahamyāti, Śarvabhauma, Jayatsena, Avācīna, Ariha, Mahābhauma, Ayutanāyin, Akrodhana, Devātithi, Ariha, Rikṣa, Matināra, who is therefore the fifteenth from Puru, instead of the fourth as in the first account or the twelfth as in the text.

2. Dhundu : Vāyu. Śambhu : Agni, Sudhanvan : Brahma.

3. Bahuvidha : Agni and Matsya.

4. Sampāti : Agni.

5. Omitted : Vāyu. Bahuvādin : Matsya.

6. Bhadrāśva : Matsya.

7. Rājeyu : Vāyu. Riceyu : Agni. They were the sons of the Apsarās Ghṛtācī : or of Misrakeśī : Mahābhārata. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa, have very unaccountably and in opposition to all other authorities, transferred the whole of the descendants of Anu of this family; substituting for Anu the second name in our text, Kakṣeyu, (Bk. IV. Ch. XVII.)

8. The Vāyu names also ten daughters, Rudrā, Śūdrā, Madrā, Subhāgā, Amalajā, Talā, Khalā, Gopajālā, Tāmrarasā and Ratnakūṭī; and adds that they were married to Prabhākara, a Ṛṣi of the race of Atri. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa have a legend of the birth of Soma, the moon, from him and one of these ten; who succeeded to the power and prerogatives of Atri. The sons of the other wives were less distinguished, but they formed families eminent amongst holy Brāhmaṇas, called Svastyātreyas.

9. Atimāra or Atibhāra : Bhāgavata. Antināra : Matsya. Matināra : Mahābhārata, Agni and Brahma. According to the Matsya and Hari Vaṁśa (not in the Brahma Purāṇa), Gaurī the daughter of this prince, was the mother of Māndhātri, of the family of Ikṣvāku.

10. In place of these the Matsya has Amūrttirayas and Nṛcandra and there are several varieties in the nomenclature. In place of the first we have Vasu or Trasu, Vāyu; Taṅsurogha, Agni; Taṅsurodha, Brahma; and Sumati, Bhāgavata. Pratiratha is read for the second of the Agni and Brahma; and for the third, Suratha, Agni; Subahu, Hari Vaṁśa.

11. Medhātithi is the author of many hymns in the Ṛgveda and we have therefore Brāhmaṇas and religious teachers descended from Kṣatriyas.

12. Malina : Vāyu. Raibhya : Bhāgavata. Dharmanetra: Brahma Purāṇa. The Hari Vaṁśa omits him, making sad blundering work of the whole passage. Thus the construction is such as to intimate that Taṅsu or Taṅsurodha had a wife named Ilā, the daughter of Medhātithi; that is, his brother's great-granddaughter : मेधातिथिस्मुतस्तस्य.....इला नाम तु यस्यासीत् कव्या वै जनमेजय। ब्रह्मवादिन्यपि स्त्री च तंपुस्तामभ्यगच्छत।। but this, as the commentator observes, is contrary to common sense (अर्थकत्वादयुक्तं) and he would read it therefore, इली नाम यस्यासीत्कन्या। 'The daughter of him who was named Ilin,' a Rājā so called : but in the Vāyu and Matsya we have Ilinā, the daughter of Yama, married to Taṅsu and mother of Malina or Anila; more correctly perhaps Ailina : इलिना तु यमस्यासीत्कन्या सा जनयत् सुतम्। त्रसो (तंसो) सुदयितं पुत्रं मलिनं ब्रह्मवादिनं। उपदानवी ततो लेभे चतुरस्त्विलिनात्मजात्। सुष्यन्तंमिति।। The blunder of the Hari Vaṁśa therefore arises from the compiler's reading Yasya, 'of whom', instead of Yamasya, 'Yama'. It is not an error of transcription, for the metre requires Yasya and the remark of the commentator proves the correctness of the reading. The name occurs Īlina (ईलिन), the son of Taṅsu, in the Mahābhārata, agreeably to the Anuvaṅśa śloka, which is there quoted. 'Sarasvatī bore Taṅsu to Matināra and Taṅsu begot a son, Īlina, by Kāliṅgī :' तंसुं सरस्वतीपुत्रं मतिनारादजीजनत्। ईलिनं जनयामास कालिंग्यां तंसुरात्मजं।।

13. The Vāyu, Matsya and Bhāgavata agree with out text in making these the grandsons of Taṅsu : even the Brahma Purāṇa concurs, but the Hari Vaṁśa makes them his sons, having apparently transformed Ṭaṅsosuta (टंसो सुतः), the son of Taṅsu, into a synonym of Taṅsu or Taṅsurodha as in these parallel passages : तंसो सुतोऽथराजर्षिर्धर्म्मनेत्रः प्रतापवान्। उपदानवी ततो पुत्रान् चतुरोऽजनयच्छुभान्।। 'The son of Taṅsu was the illustrious sage Dharmanetra : Upadānavī had from him four excellent sons.' Brahma Purāṇa तंसुरोधोऽथराजर्षि धर्म्मनेत्रः प्रतापवान्। उपदा नवी सुतान् लेमे चतुरस्तंसुरोधतः।। 'Taṅsurodha was a royal sage, the illustrious institution of laws. Upadānavī had four sons from Taṅsurodha.' Hari Vaṁśa. The commentator explains Dharmanetra (धर्म्मनेत्र) to be 'institution of laws' (धर्म्मप्रवर्त्तकः). We have Upadānavī before, as the daughter of Vṛṣaparvan the Daitya, married to Hiraṇyākṣa. Homilton (Buchanan) calls her the wife of Sughora. The four sons are named in other authorities, with some variations : Duṣyanta, Suṣyanta or Ṛṣyanta or Sumanta, Pravīra and Aṅgaha or Naya. The Mahābhāraṭa enumerates five, Duṣyanta, Śūra, Bhīma, Vasu and Pravasu, but makes them the sons of Īlina and grandson of Taṅsu.

14. These two ślokas are taken from the Mahābhārata. Ādi Parvan and are part of the testimony borne by a heavenly messenger to the birth of Bharata. They are repeated in the same book, in the account of the family of Puru. They occur, with a slight variation of the order, in other Purāṇas, as the Vāyu, etc., and show the greater antiquity of the story of Śakuntalā, although they do not narrate it. The meaning of the name Bharata is differently explained in Śakuntalā; he is said to be so called from 'supporting' the world : he is also there named Sarvadamana, 'the conqueror of all.'

15. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa, the latter especially, appear to have modified this legend, with the view perhaps of reconciling those circumstances which are related of Bharadvāja as a sage with his history as a king. While therefore they state that Bharadvāja was brought by the winds of Bharata, they state that he was so brought to perform a sacrifice by which a son was born, whom Bharadvāja also inaugurated : धर्म्मसंक्रमणं चापि मरुद्भिर्भरताय वै। अयाजयद्भरद्वाजो महद्भिः क्रतुभिर्हितं। पूर्वं तु वितथे तस्य कृते पुत्रजन्मनि। ततोऽर्थ वितथो नाम भरद्वाजात् सुतोऽभवत्।। In the Vāyu, Matsya and Agni, however, the story is much more consistently narrated; and Bharadvāja, being abandoned by his natural parent, is brought by the winds, as a child, not as sage; and being adopted by Bharata, is one and the same with Vitatha, as our text relates. Thus in the Vāyu, the Maruts bring to Bharata, already sacrificing for progency (भरद्वाजं ततः पुत्रं वार्हस्पत्यं), Bharadvāja, the son of Bṛhaspati; and Bharata receiving him says. "This Bharadvāja shall be Vitatha :', ततः सवितथो नाम भरद्वाजस्तदास्म्यहं। The Matsya also says, the Maruts in compassion took the child and being pleased with Bharata's worship, gave it to him and he was named Vitatha : जगृहुस्तं भरद्वाजं मरुतः कृपयानिवताः। तेन ते मरुतस्तस्य मरुत्सोमेन तुष्टुवुः। उपनिन्यु र्भरद्वाजं पुत्रार्थं भरताय वै। पूर्व्वं तु वितथे तस्मिन् कृते वै पुत्रजन्मनि। ततस्तु वितथो नाम भरद्वाजो नृपो भवान्।। And the Agni tells the whole story in one verse : ततो मरुद्भिरानीय पुत्रस्म तु बृहस्पतेः। संक्रामितो भरद्वाजः क्रतुभि र्वितथोऽभवत्। 'Then the son of Bṛhaspati, being taken by the winds. Bharadvāja was transferred with sacrifice and was Vitatha.' The account given in the Bhāgavata is to the same purpose. The commentator on the text also makes the matter clear enough : भरद्वाजस्यैवभरतपुत्रत्वदशायां वितथेतिनाम्। 'The name of Bharadvāja in the condition of son of Bharata was Vitatha.' It is clear that a new-born infant could not be the officiating priest at a sacrifice for his own adoption, whatever the compiler of the Hari Vaṁśa may please to assert. From Bharadvāja, a Brāhmaṇa by birth and king by adoption, descended Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas, the children of two fathers : तस्मादेव भरद्वाजाद्ब्राह्मणाः क्षत्रिया भुवि। द्वामुख्यायणनामानः स्मृता द्विपितरस्तु वै।। The Mahābhārata, in the Ādi Parvan, tells the story very simple. In one place, v. 3710, it says that Bharata, on the birth of his children proving vain, obtained from Bharadvāja, by great sacrifices, a son, Bhūmanyu; and in another passage it makes Bhūmanyu the son of Bharata by Sunandā, daughter of Sarvasena, king of Kāśī; p. 139, v. 3785. The two are not incompatible.

16. Manyu : Bhāgavata. Suketu : Agni. But the Brahma and Hari Vaṁśa omit this and the next generation and make Suhotra, Anuhotra, Gaya, Garga and Kapila the sons of Vitatha : they then assign to Suhotra two sons, Kāśika and Ghṛtsamati and identify them and their descendants with the progeny of Āyu, who were kings of Kāśī (see Bk. IV. Ch. VIII. n. 15); a piece of confusion unwarranted by any other authority except the Agni.

17. Vṛhat, Ahārya, Nara, Garga : Matsya.

18. Guruvīrya and Trideva : Vāyu. The first is called Gurudhī, Matsya; and Guru, Bhāgavata : they agree in Rantideva. The Bhāgavata describes the great liberality of this prince and his practice of Yoga. According to a legend preserved in the Megha Duta, his sacrifices of kine were so numerous, that their blood formed the river Carmanvatī, the modern Cambal.

19. Śivi : Matsya.

20. The other authorities concur in this statemcnt; thus furnishing an additional instance of one caste proceeding from another. No reason is assigned : the commentator says it was from some cause : केनचित् कारणाद्ब्राह्मणाश्चबभूवुः।

21. Durbhakṣaya : Vāyu. Urukṣat : Matsya, Duritakṣaya : Bhāgavata.

22. Trayāruṇi, Puṣkarāruṇi, Kavi; all became Brāhmaṇas : उरुक्षतः सुताह्येते सर्व्वे ब्राह्मणतां गताः। Matsya : and there were three chief branches of the Kāvyas or descendants of Kavi : काव्यानां तु वराह्येते त्रयः प्रोक्ता महर्षयः गर्गाः। संकृतयः काव्याः क्षत्रोपेता द्विजातयः।। Gargas, Sankṛtis and Kāvyas. Ibid.

23. In the Mahābhārata, Suhotra is the son of Bhūmanyu; and in one place the father of Ajamīḍha, etc., and in another of Hastin. The Brahma Purāṇa in some degree and the Hari Vaṁśa in a still greater, have made most extraordinary confusion in the instance of this name. In our text and in all the best authorities we have three Suhotras, perfectly distinct : 1. Suhotra, great-grandson of Amāvasu, father of Jahnu and ancestor of Viśvāmitra and the Kauśikas (see Bk. III. Ch. XI.); 2. Suhotra son of Kṣatravṛddha and grandson of Ayus and progenitor of the race of Kāśī kings (Bk. IV. Ch. VIII.); and 3. Suhotra the son of Vṛhatkṣatra, grandson of Vitatha and parent of Hastin. In the two blundering compilations mentioned, we have, first (Hari Vaṁśa c. 20), a Suhotra son of Vṛhatkṣatra, of the race of Puru; his descent is not given, but, from the names which follow Suhotra, the dynasty is that of our present text : secondly (Hari Vaṁśa c. 27), Suhotra son of Kāñcana, of the line of Amāvasu and father of Jahnu, etc. thirdly (Hari Vaṁśa c. 29), Suhotra the son of Kṣatravṛddha and progenitor of the Kāśī kings : fourthly (Hari Vaṁśa 32), we have the first and third of these personages confounded; Suhotra is made the son of Vitatha and progenitor of the Kāśī kings, the dynasty of whom is repeated; thus connecting them with the line of Puru instead of Āyus, in opposition to all authority. Again, we have a notable piece of confusion and Suhotra the son of Vitatha is made the father of Vṛhat, the father of the three princes who in our text and in the Hari Vaṁśa (c. 20) are the sons of Hastin; and amongst whom Ajamīḍha is made the father of Jahnu and ancestor of the Kauśikas, instead of being, as in c. 27 and as every where else, of the family of Amāvasu. The source of all this confusion is obvious. The compilers extracted all the authentic traditions accurately enough, but, puzzled by the identity of name, they have also mixed the different accounts together and caused very absurd and needless perplexity. It is quite clear also that the Hari Vaṁśa does not deserve the pains taken and taken fruitlessly, by Hamilton and M. Langlois to reduce it to consistency. It is of no weight whatever as an authority for the dynasties of kings, although it furnishes some particular details, which it has picked up possibly from authentic sources not now available.

24. It was finally ruined by the encroachments of the Ganges, but vestiges of it were, at least until lately, to be traced along the river, nearly in a line with Delhi, about sixty miles to the east.

25. In one place, son of Suhotra; in another, grandson of Hastin : Mahābhārata.

26. The copies agree in this reading, yet it can scarcely be correct. Kaṇva has already been noticed as the son of Apratiratha. According to the Bhāgavata, the elder son of Ajamīḍha was Priyamedhas, from whom a tribe of Brāhmaṇas descended. The Matsya has Vṛhaddanuṣ and names the wife of Ajamīḍha, Dhūminī. It also however, along with the Vāyu, makes Kaṇva the son of Ajamīḍha by his wife Keśinī.

27. Vṛhaddanuṣ : Bhāgavata. Also called Vṛhaddarman : Hari Vaṁśa.

28. Vṛhatkaya : Bhāgavata.

29. Satyajit : Hari Vaṁśa.

30. Aśvajit : Matsya, Viśada : Bhāgavata.

31.

Bhāgavata	Matsya	Hari Vaṁśa
Rucirāśva	Rucirāśva	Rucira
Kāśya	Kāśya	Śvetaketu
Dṛḍhahanu	Dṛḍhāśva	Mahimnāra
Vatsa	Vatsa k. of Avanti.	Vatsa k. of Avanti.

32. Kāmpilya appears to be the Kampil of the Mohammedans, situated in the Doab. It was included in southern Pāñcāla. The Matsya makes Samara the son of Kāśya.

33. Vibhrāja in MSS., also in the Vāyu,

34. The Bhāgavata omits the descents subsequent to Nīpa and makes Brahmadatta the son of Nīpa by Sukṛti. In the Hari Vaṁśa is a curious legend of the different transmigrations of Brahmadatta and his six companions, who were successively as many Brāhmaṇas, then foresters, then deer, then water-fowl, then swans and finally Brāhmaṇas again, when with the king they obtained liberation. According to the Bhāgavata, Brahmadatta composed a treatise on the Yoga, a Yogatantra.

35. Daṇḍasena : Hari Vaṁśa.

36. Bhallāka : Vāyu. Bhallāda : Bhāgavata. The Vāyu makes him the last of the race. The Hari Vaṁśa adds that he was killed by Kārṇa. The Matsya names his successor Janamejaya, when the race of the Nīpas was exterminated by Ugrāyudha; as noticed below.

37. So the Vāyu and Bhāgavata. The Matsya and Hari Vaṁśa, with less consistency, derive this family also from Ajamīḍha.

38. Kṛtimat : Bhāgavata.

39. Between these two the Vāyu inserts Mahat and Rukmaratha. The Matsya, Sudhanvan, Śarvabhauma., Mahāpaurava and Rukmadhara. The Brahma Purāṇa, Sudharman, Śarvabhauma, Mahat and Rukmaratha.

40. The Bhāgavata says he was the author of six Saṁhitās of the Sāmaveda. (See Bk. III. Ch. VI).

41. The Hari Vaṁśa says he killed Nīpa, the grandfather of Pṛṣata, but it had previously stated that it was the son of Bhallāṭa, several descents after Nīpa, who was killed by Ugrāyudha : and again (c. 32), Pṛṣata, conformably to other authorities, appears as the father of Drupada, in the family of Sṛñjaya. The Hari Vaṁśa relates the destruction of Ugrāyudha by Bhīṣma, in consequence of his demanding in marriage the widow of Śāntanu : after which, Pṛṣata, it is said, recovered possession of Kāmpilya.

42. Purañjaya : Bhāgavata.

43. Purujāti : Vāyu. Puruja : Bhāgavata. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa omit Nīla and Śānti.

44. Rikṣa : Vāyu. Pṛthu : Matsya. Arka : Bhāgavata. Omitted : Brahma.

45. Bāhyāsva : Agni. Bhadraśva : Matsya Bharmyasva : Bhāgavata.

46. Jaya : Matsya. Sañjaya : Bhāgavata.

47. Yavinara : Agni and Bhāgavata. Javīnara : Matsya.

48. Kapila : Matsya. Kṛmilāśva : Brahma.

49. Pāñcāla was at first the country north and west of Delhi, between the foot of the Himālaya and the Cambal. It was afterwards divided into northern and southern Pāñcāla, separated by the Ganges. Mākandi on the Ganges and Kāmpilya were the chief cities of the latter; Ahikṣetra in the former. The Pāñcālas, according to the Mahābhārata, expelled Samvaraṇa from Hastināpur, but it was recovered by Kuru. The purpose of the term Pāñcāla is similarly explained in other Purāṇas. In the Mahābhārata they are the grandsons of Ajamīḍha.

50. The Matsya says that they, as well as the Kaṇvas, were all followers or partisans of Aṅgiras : मुद्गलस्यापिमौद्गल्याः क्षत्रोपेता द्विजातयः एतेह्यङ्गिरसः पक्षे संस्थिताः कण्वमुद्गलाः। The Hari Vaṁśa has nearly the same words.

51. Bhadrayāśva : Vāyu. Pañcāśva : Agni. Bandhyāśva : Matsya. Bhārmya : Bhāgavata. But there is some indistinctness as to his descent. The Matsya and Hari Vaṁśa give the son of Mudgala only his patronymic Maudgalya. According to the first, his son was Indrasena; and his son, Bandhyāśva. The second makes Badhryāśva the son of Maudgalya by Indrasena. The Bhāgavata makes Bhārmya, the patronymic of Mudgala, the son of Bharmyāśva and who is the father of Divodāsa and Ahalyā : मिथुनं मुद्गलाद्भाम्र्यां द्विवोदासः पुमामभूत्। The commentator has, भाम्र्यात् भम्र्याश्चपुत्रात्।

52. In the Rāmāyaṇa, Śatānanda appears as the family priest of Janaka, the father of Sītā.

53. From whom the Maitreya Brāhmaṇas were descended : Hari Vaṁśa. In the Matsya and Agni the son of Mītrāyu is called Maitreya (Bk. I. Ch. I). The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa here close the lineage of Divodāsa : the Agni adds but one name, Somāpi. They then proceed with the descendants of Sṛñjaya, one of the Pāñcālas or Pañcadhanuṣ, Somadatta, Sahadeva and then as in our text. The Vāyu and Bhāgavata agree with the latter in making the line continuous from Divodāsa. According to the Matsya and Brahma Purāṇa the race of Ajamīḍha became extinct in the person of Sahadeva, but Ajamīḍha was thence called the Somaka family. It was in the reign of Drupada that the possessions of the Pāñcālas were divided; Droṇa, assisted by the Pāṇḍavas, conquering the country and proceeding the southern portion again to Drupada, as related in the Mahābhārata. The two princes last named in the list figure in the great war.

54. The Hari Vaṁśa gives him two brothers, Dhūmravarṇa and Sudarśana. In the Mahābhārata one list agrees with the text; the other calls Samvaraṇa the son of Ajamīḍha by his wife Rikṣā.

55. One other is named in the Bhāgavata, Matsya, Brahma and Agni; Animejaya, Arimarddana and Niṣadhāśva. The Hari Vaṁśa has Sudhanvat in place of Jahnu; having also Sudhanuṣ.

56. Kṛta : Vāyu. Kṛtayajña : Brahma. Kṛmi : Matsya, Kṛti : Bhāgavata.

57. The story of Uparicara or a Vasu who by command of Indra became king of Cedi, is told in the Mahābhārata, Ādi Parvan. He is there said to have at first five sons, Vṛhadratha, king of Magadha, Pratyagra, Kuśāmba, also called Manivāhana, Māvella and Yadu, by his wife Girikā; afterwards he has, by Adrikā, an Apsarās condemned to the form of a fish, Matsya a son and Satyavati or Kālī a daughter : the latter was the mother of Vyāsa. The same legend is referred to in the accounts of Uparicara and his family in the Bhāgavata, Matsya, Hari Vaṁśa, etc.

58. Vṛṣabha : Matsya.

59. Satyajita : Vāyu. Satyahita : Bhāgavata. Satyadhṛtra or Puṣya : Matsya.

60. This story is told in the 16th section of the Sabhā Parvan of the Mahābhārata, where also he is called the son of Vṛhadratha. In the Vāyu he is the son of Satyajita. The Agni has Satyahita, Urjja, Sambhava, Jarāsandha; and the Matsya, Satyadhṛita, Dhanuṣa, Śarva, Sambhava, Jarāsandha.

61. Somādhi : Vāyu. Udāpa : Agni. Udāyus : Brahma. Somavit : Matsya.

62. Śrutakarman : Agni. Śrutaśarman : Brahma.

Parāśara said– Parīkṣit, the son of Kuru, had four sons, Janamejaya, Śrutasena, Ugrasena and Bhīmsena.[1] The son of Jahnu was Suratha; his son was Vidūratha; his son was Sārvabhauma; his son was Jayasena, his son was Ārāvin; his son was Ayutāyus; his son was Akrodhana; one of his sons was Devatithi and another was called Rikṣa, his son was Dilīpa; his son was Pratīpa, who had three sons, Devāpi, Śāntanu and Bāhlīka. The first adopted in childhood a forest life and Śāntanu became king. Of him this verse is spread through the earth; "Śāntanu is his name, because if he lays his hands upon an old man, he restores him to youth and by him men obtain tranquillity (śānti)."

In the kingdom over which Śāntanu ruled there was no rain for twelve years. Apprehensive that the country would become a desert, the king assembled the Brāhmaṇas and asked them why no rain fell and what fault he had committed. They told him that he was as it were a younger brother married before an elder, for he was in the enjoyment of the earth, which was the right of his elder brother Devāpi. "What then am I to do?" said the Rājā : to which they replied, "Until the gods shall be displeased with Devāpi, by his declining from the path of righteousness, the kingdom is his and to him therefore you should resign it." When the minister of the king Asmarsārīn, heard this, he collected a number of ascetics who taught doctrines opposed to those of the Vedas and sent them into the forest; where meeting with Devāpi, they perverted the understanding of the simple-minded prince and led him to adopt heretical notions. In the meantime, Śāntanu being much distressed to think that he had been guilty of the offence intimated by the Brāhmaṇas, sent them before him into the woods and then proceeded thither himself, to restore the kingdom to his elder brother. When the Brāhmaṇas arrived at the hermitage of Devāpi, they informed him, that, according to the doctrines of the Vedas, succession to a kingdom was the right of the elder brother : but he entered into discussion with them and in various ways advanced arguments which had the defect of being contrary to the precepts of the Vedas. When the Brāhmaṇas heard this, they turned to Śāntanu and said, "Come hither, Rājā; you need give yourself no further trouble in this matter; the dearth is at an end; this man is fallen from his state, for he has uttered words of disrespect to the authority of the eternal, uncreated Veda; and when the elder brother is degraded, there is no sin in the prior espousals of his junior." Śāntanu thereupon returned to his capital and administered the government as before, and his elder brother Devāpi being degraded from his caste by repeating doctrines contrary to the Vedas, Indra poured down abundant rain, which was followed by plentiful harvests.[2]

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे विंशः अध्यायः॥

The son of Bāhlīka was Somadatta, who had three sons, Bhūri, Bhūriśravas and Śala.[3] The son of Śāntanu was the illustrious and learned Bhīṣma, who was born to him by the holy river-goddess, Gaṅgā; and he had by his wife Satyavatī two sons, Citrāṅgada and Vicitravīrya. Citrāṅgada, while yet a youth, was killed in a conflict with a Gandharva, also called Citrāṅgada. Vicitravīrya married Ambā and Ambalikā, the daughters of the king of Kāśī; and indulging too freely in connubial rites, fell into a consumption, of which he died. By command of Satyavatī, my son Kṛṣṇa-dvaipāyana, ever obedient to his mother's wishes,[4] begot upon the widows of his brother the princes Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Pāṇḍu and upon a female servant, Vidūra. Dhṛtarāṣṭra had Duryodhana, Duhṣāsana and other sons, to the number of a hundred. Pāṇḍu having incurred the curse of a deer, whose mate he had killed in the chase, was deterred from procreating children; and his wife Kuntī bore to him in consequence three sons, who were begotten by the deities Dharma, Vāyu and Indra, namely, Yudhiṣṭhira, Bhīma and Arjuna : and his wife Mādrī had two sons, Nakula and Sahadeva, by the celestial sons of Aśvinī. These had each a son by Draupadī. The son of Yudhiṣṭhira was Prativindhya; of Bhīma, Śrutasoma; of Arjuna, Śrutakīrtti; of Nakula, Śatānīka; and of Sahadeva, Śrutakarman. The Pāṇḍavas had also other sons.[5] By his wife Yaudheyī, Yudhiṣṭhira had Devaka. The son of Bhīma by Hiḍimbā was Ghaṭotkaca and he had also Sarvatraga by his wife Kāśī. The son of Sahadeva by Vijayā was Suhotra; and Niramitra was the son of Nakula by Kareṇumatī. Arjuna had Irāvat by the serpent-nymph Ulupī; Babhruvāhana, who was adopted as the son of his maternal grandfather, by the daughter of the king of Manipura; and by his wife Subhadrā, Abhimanyu, who even in extreme youth was renowned for his valour and his strength and crushed the chariots of his foes in fight. The son of Abhimanyu by his wife Uttarā was Parīkṣit, who, after the Kurus were all destroyed, was killed in his mother's womb by the magic Brahma weapon, hurled by Aśvatthāman : he was however restored to life by the clemency of that being whose feet receive the homage of all the demons and the gods and who for his own pleasure had assumed a human shape (Kṛṣṇa). This prince, Parīkṣit, now reigns over the whole world with undivided sway.[6]

NOTES

1. This, although it occurs in other authorities, appears to be an error, for these are the sons of a subsequent Parīkṣit (see the next chapter). The Matsya omits Parīkṣit here and the Bhāgavata states that he had no children. In most of the Purāṇas, however, the line of Parīkṣat is continued, but there is very great confusion in the lineage. According to the Vāyu, Janamejaya was the son of Parīkṣit, whose son was Śrutasena, whose son was Bhīmasena, Janamejaya had also a son named Suratha; but Suratha was also the name of the son of Jahnu, from whom the line continues as in the text. The Brahma Purāṇa and Hari Vaṁśa also make Suratha the son both of Janamejaya and of Jahnu; and they observe that there are two Rikṣas, two Parīkṣits, three Bhīmsenas and two Janamejayas, in the lunar race. Some of the confusion probably originates with the Mahābhārata, which, as before noticed, gives two lists from Puru to Śāntanu, differing from one another and from all the lists of the Purāṇas. In the first of these lists such collateral names have been retained as appear to have furnished our text and that of other Purāṇas with distinct persons : thus making the members of one fraternity so many descents. Of the two lists, however, the second is probably to be regarded as the more recent, if not more correct; for Vaiśāmpāyana repeats it at Janamejaya's request, because the latter is not satisfied with the summary account which the former had first communicated to him. Mahābhārata vol. I. p. 136 and p. 138.

2. The Mahābhārata merely states that Devāpi retired to a religious life. The story of his heresy is narrated, much as in the text, in the Bhāgavata, Vāyu. The Matsya adds, that he was also leprous; on which account his subjects contemned him. He was probably set aside in favour of his younger brother, either on that account or on that of his heresy; such a disposition being conformable to Hindu law. According to the Bhāgavata and Matsya he is still alive at a place called Kalāpa grāma, where, in the Kṛta age of the next Mahāyuga, he will be the restorer of the Kṣatriya race.

3. The Matsya says that Bāhlīka had a hundred sons or lords of the Bahlīkas.

4. Before her marriage to Śāntanu, Satyavatī had a son, Kṛṣṇa-dvaipāyana or Vyāsa, by Parāśara : he was therefore the half brother of Vicitravīrya and legally qualified to raise up offspring to him by his widow. This law is abrogated in the present age. The whole story of the sons of Śāntanu is told at length in the Mahābhārata.

5. The Mahābhārata names some of them rather differently and adds some particulars. Thus Yaudheya was the son of Yudhiṣṭhira by his wife Devīkā, daughter of Govāsana of the Śaivya tribe. The son of Bhīmasena was Sarvaga by Balandharā, princess of Kāśī; he had also Ghaṭotkaca by Hiḍimbā. Abhimanyu was the son of Arjuna by Subhadrā. The wives and sons of the other two are the same but Kareṇumatī is termed a princess of Cedī and Vijayā of Madra.

6. In the details immediately preceding, the Purāṇas generally concur, deriving them probably from the same source, the Ādi Parvan of the Mahābhārata and employing very frequently the same words. The period at which the chapter closes is supposed to be that at which the Vyāsa, who arranged or compiled the Purāṇas, is believed to have flourished. Parīkṣit died of the bite of a snake, according to the Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva. The Bhāgavata is supposed to have been narrated to him in the interval between the bite and its fatal effect.

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे एकविंशः अध्यायः॥

I will now enumerate the kings who will reign in future periods.[1] The present monarch, Parīkṣit,[2] will have four sons, Janamejaya, Śrutasena, Ugrasena and Bhīmasena.[3] The son of Janamejaya will be Śatānīka,[4] who will study the Vedas under Yājñyavalkya and military science with Kṛpa; but becoming dissatisfied with sensual enjoyments, he will acquire spiritual knowledge from the instructions of Śaunaka and ultimately obtain salvation. His son will be Aśvamedhadatta (a son given by the gods in reward for the sacrifice of a horse);[5] his son will be Asīma-Kṛṣṇa;[6] his son will be Nicakra,[7] who will remove the capital to Kauśāmbī, in consequence of Hastināpura being washed away by the Ganges; his son will be Uṣṇa;[8] his son will be Citraratha; his son will be Vṛṣṇimat;[9] his son will be Sunītha;[10] his son will be Ricā;[11] his son will be Nṛcakṣu;[12] his son will be Sukhībala;[13] his son will be Pariplava; his son will be Sunaya;[14] his son will be Medhāvin; his son will be Nṛpañjaya;[15] his son will be Mṛdu;[16] his son will be Tigma;[17] his son will be Vṛhadratha; his son will be Vasudāna;[18] and his son will be another Śatānīka; his son will be Udayana;[19] his son will be Ahīnara;[20] his son will be Khaṇḍapāni;[21] his son will be Niramitra;[22] his son will be Kṣemaka;[23] of him this verse is recited; "The race which gave origin to Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas and which was purified by regal sages, terminated with Kṣemaka in the Kali age.[24]"

NOTES

1. The style now adopted is that of prophecy, as Vyāsa could not consistently have recorded the events which were posterior to his time.

2. Also read Parīkṣita, Parīkṣa and Parīkṣi.

3. See Bk. IV. Ch. XX. The Vāyu and Matsya relate, rather obscurely, a dispute between Janamejaya and Vaiśampāyana, in consequence of the former's patronage of the Brāhmaṇas of the Vājasaneyi branch of the Yajurveda, in opposition to the latter, who was the author of the black or original Yajuṣ (see Bk. III. Ch. V). Janamejaya twice performed the Aśvamedha according to the Vājasaneyi ritual and established the Trisarvī or use of certain texts of Aśmaka and others by the Brāhmaṇas of Aṅga and by those of the middle country. He perished however in consequence, being cursed by Vaiśampāyana. Before their disagreement Vaiśampāyana related the Mahābhārata to Janamejaya. Mahābhārata Ādi Parvan.

4. The reading of the text is rather, 'his ((Parīkṣ it's) other son will be Śatānīka;' तस्यापर: शतानीको भविष्यति। but the commentator refers 'his' to Janamejaya; तस्यजनमेजयस्य। The Vāyu, Matsya and Bhāgavata also make Śatānīka the son of Jan amejaya. The Brahma Purāṇa has a totally different series or Parīkṣit; Sūryāpiḍa, Candrāpiḍa, Janamejaya, Satyakarṇa, Śvetakarṇa, Sukumāra and Ajaśyāma.

5. The Bhāgavata interposes Sahasrānīka. The Vṛhatkathā has the same descent, but calls the son of Shasrānīka, Udayana or Vatsa. The Bhāgavata has Aśvamedhaja.

6. Adhisāma K. : Vāyu. Adhisoma K. : Matsya. The former states that the Vāyu Purāṇa was narrated in this king's reign, in the second year of a three years' sacrifice at Kurukṣetra.

7. Nemicakra : Bhāgavata. Vicakṣus : Matsya. They agree with the text as to the removal of the capital and the cause.

8. Ukta :Bhāgavata. Bhūrijyeṣtha : Matsya.

9. Sucidratna, Vāyu : Sucidrava. Mats.; Kaviratha, Bhāgavata; is interposed between Citraratha and Vṛṣnīmat.

10. Sutīrtha : Vāyu.

11. Ruci : Vāyu. Omitted : Matsya and Bhāgavata.

12. Citrākṣa : Vāyu.

13. Sukhīnala : Bhāgavata.

14. Sutapas : Matsya.

15. Purañjaya :Matsya.

16. Ūrva : Matsya. Dūrva : Bhāgavata.

17. Tigmātman : Matsya. Timi : Bhāgavata.

18. Sudāsa : Bhāgavata. Vasudāman : Matsya.

19. The Matsya concurs with the text (see above, note 5), the Bhāgavatas has Durdaman.

20. Vahīnara : Bhāgavata.

21. Daṇḍapāni : Bhāgavata, Vāyu, Matsya.

22. Nimi : Bhāgavata.

23. Kṣepaka : Vāyu.

24. The same memorial verse is quoted in the Matsya and Vāyu Purāṇa, preceded by one which states the number of princes twenty-five. The specification however, commencing with Śatānīka, is twenty-six or twenty-seven. The passage is, पंचविंशनृपाह्येते भविष्या: पूर्व्ववंशजा:। अनुवंशशश्लोकोऽयं गीतो विप्रै: पुरातनै:। ब्रह्मक्षत्रस्य यो योनिर्वंशो देवर्षि सत्कृत:। क्षेमकं प्राप्य राजानं संस्थां प्राप्स्पति वै कलौ॥

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चतुर्थांशे द्वाविंशः अध्यायः॥

I will not repeat to you the future princes of the family of Ikṣvāku.[1]

The son of Vṛhadbala[2] will be Vṛhatkṣaṇa;[3] his son will be Urukṣepa;[4] his son will be Vatsa;[5] his son will be Vatsavyūha;[6] his son will be Prativyoman;[7] his son will be Divākara; his son will be Sahadeva;[8] his son will be Vṛhadaśva;[9] his son will be Bhānuratha;[10] his son will be Supratītha;[11] his son will be Marudeva;[12] his son will be Sunakṣ atra, his son will be Kinnara;[13] his son will be Antarikṣa; his son will be Suvarṇa;[14] his son will be Amitrajit;[15] his son will be Vṛhadrāja;[16] his son will be Dharman;[17] his son will Kṛtañjaya, his son will be Raṇañjaya; his son will be Saṅjaya; his son will be Śākya;[18] his son will be Śuddhodana,[19] his son will be Rātula,[20] his son will be Prasenajit, his son will be Kṣudraka, his son will be Kuṇdaka;[21] his son will be Suratha;[22] his son will be Sumitra. These are the kings of the family of Ikshwāku, descended from Vrihadbala. This commemorative verse is current concerning them; "The race of the descendants of Ikshwāku will terminate with Sumitra: it will end in the Kali age with him."[23]

NOTES

1. See Bk. IV. Ch. II.

2. Vṛhadratha :Vāyu.

3. Vṛhatkṣaya : Vāyu. Vṛhadraṇa : Bhāgavata. Omitted : Matsya.

4. Omitted : Vāyu. Urukṣaya : Matsya. Urukriya : Bhāgavata.

5. Omitted by all three.

6. Vatsavṛddha : Bhāgavata.

7. Prativyūha : Vāyu.

8. The Bhāgavata inserts Bhānu. The Matsya says that Ayodhyā was the capital of Divākara. The Vāyu omits the next twelve names; probably a defect in the copies.

9. Druvāśva : Matsya.

10. Bhānumat : Bhāgavata, Bhāvyaratha or Bhāvya : Matsya.

11. Pratīkāśva : Bhāgavata. Pratīpāśva : Matsya.

12. The Bhāgavata and Matsya prefix a Supratīpa or Supratīka.

13. Puṣkara : Bhāgavata.

14. Suparvan or Sumantra : Matsya. Sutapas : Bhāgavata.

15. Amantravit : Matsya.

16. Vṛhadbrāja : Bhāgavata.

17. Omitted : Matsya Varhiṣ : Bhāgavata.

18. The Bhāgavata and Vāyu have Śākya. My copy of the Matsy has Śādhya, but the Radcliffe MS., more correctly, no doubt. Śakya (शक्यः).

19. In some copies Krodhodana; but it is also Śuddhodana, Matsya and Vāyu; Śuddhoda, Bhāgavata.

20. Rāhula : Vāyu. Siddhārtha or Puṣkala : Matsya Lāṅgala : Bhāgavata. This and the two preceding names are of considerable chronological interest; for Śākya is the name of the author or reviver of Buddhism, whose birth appears to have occurred in the seventh and death in the sixth century before Christ (B.C. 621-543). There can be no doubt of the individual here intended, although he is out of his place, for he was the son, not the father, of Śuddhodana and the father of Rāhula; as he is termed in the Amara and Haima Kośas, Śaudhodani or Śuddhodana suta the son of Śuddhodana and Rāhulasu the parent of Rāhula : so also in the Mahāvaṁśa, Siddhārtha or Śakya is the son of Śuddhodano and father of Rāhula. Turnour's translation, p. 9. Whether they are rightly included amongst the princes of the race of Ikṣvāku is more questionable, for Śuddhodana is usually described as a petty prince, whose capital was not Ayodhyā, but Kapilavastu. At the same time it appears that the provinces of the Doab had passed into the possession of princes of the lunar line and the children of the sun may have been reduced to the country north of the Ganges or the modern Gorakhpur, in which Kapila was situated. The Buddhists do usually consider their teacher Śākya to be descended from Ikṣvāku. The chronology is less easily adjusted, but it is not altogether incompatible. According to the lists of the text, Śākya, as the twenty-second of the line of Ikṣvāku, is contemporary with Ripuñjaya, the twenty-second and last of the kings of Magadhā, of the family of Jarāsandha; but, agreeably to the Buddhist authorities, he was the friend of Bimbasāra, a king who in the Paurāṇik list appears to be the fifth of the Śaiśunāga dynasty and tenth from Ripuñjaya. The same number of princes does not necessarily imply equal duration of dynasty and Ikṣvāku's descendants may have out-lasted those of Jarāsandha; or as is more likely for the dynasty was obscure and is evidently imperfectly preserved - several descents may have been omitted, the insertion of which would reconcile the Paurāṇik lists with those of the Buddhists and bring Śākya down to the age of Bimbasāra. It is evident, from what occurs in other authorities, that the Aikṣ vākava princes are regarded as contemporaries even of the Śaiśunāga dynasty : see c. 24, n. 17.

21. Kṣulika : Vāyu. Kulaka or Kṣullaka : Matsya. Omitted : Bhāgavata. In the Mahāvira Caritra, a work written by the celebrated Hemacandra, in the twelfth century, we have a Prasenajit, king of Magadha, residing at Rājgṛha, succeeded by Śrenīka and he by Kūlika. The Buddhists have a Prasenajit contemporary with Śakya, son of Mahāpadma, king of Magadha. There is some confusion of persons wither in the Paurāṇik genealogies or in the Buddhist and Jain traditions, but they agree in brining the same names together about the same period.

22. Omitted : Bhāgavata.

23. The Vāyu and Bhāgavata have the same stanza. We have here twenty-nine or thirty princes of the later solar line, contemporary with the preceding twenty-six or twenty-seven of the later dynasty of the moon.,

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे चुतर्थांशे त्रयोविंशः अध्यायः॥

I will now relate to you the descendants of Vṛhadratha, who will be the kings of Magadha. There have been several powerful princes of this dynasty, of whom the most celebrated was Jarāsandha, his son was Sahadeva, his son is Somāpi;[1] his son will be Śrutavat;[2] his son will be Ayutāyus;[3] his son will be Niramitra;[4] his son will be Sukṣtra;[5] his son will be Vṛhatkarman;[6] his son will be Senajit;[7] his son will be Śrutañjaya;[8] his son will be Vipra;[9] his son will be Śuci;[10] his son will be Kṣemya,[11] his son will be Suvrata;[12] his son will be Dharma,[13] his son will be Suśuma;[14] his son will be Dṛdhasena,[15] his son will be Sumati,[16] his son will be Suvala,[17] his son will be Sunīta,[18] his son will be Satyajit,[19] his son will be Viśvajit,[20] his son will be Ripuñjaya.[21] These are the Vārhadrathas, who will reign for a thousand years.[22]

NOTES

1. Somādhi; Vāyu, Matsya : and they now affect greater precision, giving the years of the reigns. Somādhi 58, V.; 50, M.
2. Śrutaśravas, 67 years V.; 64, M.
3. 36 years V.; Apratīpa, 26, M.
4. 100 years V.; 40, M.
5. 58 years V.; 56, M.; Sunakṣatra, Bhāgavata.

19. 80 years V.; omitted, M.
20. 35 years V.; omitted, M.
21. 50 years V. and M.; Parañjaya and Viśvajit are identified, Bhāgavata.
22. Our list and that of the Vāyu specifies twenty-one kings after Sahadeva : the Bhāgavata specifies twenty and in another passage states that to be the number. My copy of the Matsya names but nineteen and the Radcliffe but twelve; but both agree in making the total thirty-two. They all concur with the text also in stating that 1000 years had elapsed from the great war, at the death of the last Vārhadratha prince; and this is more worthy of credit than the details, which are obviously imperfect.

चतुर्विंशोऽध्यायः

(कलिकालस्थित-नृपाणां कलिधर्म्मस्य च वर्णनम्।
राजवंशवर्णनोपसंहारश्च।)

पराशर उवाच

योऽयं रिपुञ्जयो नाम बार्हद्रथोऽन्त्यः, तस्य सुनिको नामामात्यो भविष्यति॥ १॥

स चैनं स्वामिनं हत्वा स्वपुत्रं प्रद्योतनामनमभिषेक्ष्यति। तस्यापि पालकनामा पुत्रो भविता। ततश्च विशाखयूपः, तत्पुत्रो, जनकः, तस्य च नन्दिवर्द्धन, इत्येते अष्टत्रिंशहुत्तरमब्दशतं पञ्चप्रद्योताः पृथिवीं भोक्ष्यन्ति॥ २॥

The last of the Bṛhadratha dynasty, Ripuñjaya, will have a minister named Sunika,[1] who having killed his sovereign, will place his won Pradyota upon the throne;[2] his son will be Pālaka;[3] his son will be Viśākhayūpa,[4] his son will be Janaka[5] and his son will be Nandivardhana.[6] These five kings of the house of Pradyota will reign over the earth for a hundred and thirty-eight years.[7]

ततश्च शिशुनागः, तत्पुत्रश्च काकवर्णो भविता। तत्पुत्रः क्षेमधर्म्मा, तस्यापि क्षत्रौजाः, तत्पुत्रो विद्मसारः, ततश्चाजातशत्रुः, तस्माच्च दर्भकः, दतर्भकाच्चोदयाश्वः, तस्मादपि नन्दिवर्द्धनः, ततो महानन्दीस, इत्येते शैशुनागा दश भूमिपालस्त्रीणि वर्षशतानि द्विषष्ट्यधिकानि भविष्यन्ति॥ ३॥

The next prince will be Śiśunāga,[8] his son will be Kākavarṇa,[9] his son will be Ks emadharman,[10] his son will be Kṣatraujas,[11] his son will be Vidmisāra,[12] his son will be Ajātaśatru,[13] his son will be Dharbaka;[14] his son will be Udayāśva;[15] his son will also be Nandivarddhana; and his son will be Mahānandi.[16] These ten Saiśunāgas will be kings of the earth for three hundred and sixty-two years.[17]

तस्याप्यष्टौ सुताः सुमात्याद्या भवितारः। तस्य च महापद्मस्यानु पृथिवीं भौक्ष्यन्ति। महापद्मस्तत्पुत्राश्च एकं वर्षशतमवनीपतयो भविष्यन्ति। नवैव तान् नन्दान् कौटिल्यो ब्राह्मणः समुद्धरिष्यति॥ ६॥

The son of Mahānanda will be born of a woman of the Śūdra or servile class; his name will be Nanda, called Mahāpadma, for he will be exceedingly avaricious.[18] Like another Paraśurāma, he will be the annihilator of the Kṣatriya race; for after him the kings of the earth will be Śūdras. He will bring the whole earth under one umbrella : he will have eight sons, Sumālya and others, who will reign after Mahāpadma; and he and his sons[19] will govern for a hundred years. The Brāhmaṇa Kauṭilya will root out the nine Nandas.[20]

तेषामभावे मौर्याश्च पृथिवीं भोक्ष्यन्ति। कौटिल्य एव चन्द्रगुप्तं राज्येऽभिषेक्ष्यति॥ ७॥

तस्यापि पुत्रो विन्दुसारो भविष्यति। तस्यापि अशोकवर्द्धनः, ततः सुयशाः, ततो दशरथः, ततः सङ्गतः ततः शालिशुकः, तस्मात् सोमशर्मा, तस्मात् शतधन्वा, तस्याप्यनु बृहद्रथनामा भविता। एवं मौर्या दश भूपतयो भविष्यन्ति अब्दशतं सप्तत्रिंशदुत्तरम्। तेषामन्ते पृथिवीं शुङ्गा भोक्ष्यन्ति॥ ८॥

Upon the cessation of the race of Nanda, the Mauryas will possess the earth, for Kauṭ ilya will place Candragupta[21] on the throne : his son will be Vindusāra;[22] his son will be Aśokavarddhana;[23] his son will be Suyaśas;[24] his son will be Daśaratha; his son will be Sangata; his son will Śāliśūka; his son will be Somaśarmman; his son will be Saśadharman;[25] and his successor will be Vṛhadratha. These are the ten Mauryas, who will reign over the earth for a hundred and thirty-seven years.[26]

अस्यात्मजोऽग्निमित्रः, तस्मात् युज्येष्ठः, ततो वसुमित्रः, तस्मादप्यार्द्रकः, ततः पुलिन्दकः, ततो घोषवसुः, तस्मादपि वज्रमित्रः, ततो भागवतः॥ १०॥

तस्माद् देवभूतिः, इत्येते दश शुङ्गा द्वादशोत्तरं वर्षशतं पृथिवीं भोक्ष्यन्ति। ततः कण्वानेषा भूर्यास्यति॥ ११॥

The dynasty of the Śuṅgas will next become possessed of the sovereignty; for Puṣ pamitra, the general of the last Maurya prince, will put his master to death and ascend the throne :[27] his son will be Agnimitra;[28] his son will be Sujyeṣṭha;[29] his son will be Vasumitra;[30] his son will be Ārdraka;[31] his son will be Pulindaka;[32] his son will be Ghoṣ avasu;[33] his son will be Vajramitra;[34] his son will be Bhāgavata;[35] his son will be Devabhūti.[36] These are the ten Śuṅgas, who will govern the kingdom for a hundred and twelve years.[37]

देवभूतिस्तु शुङ्गराजानं व्यसनिनं तस्यैवामत्यः कण्वो वसुदेवनामा निपात्य स्वयमवनीं भोक्ताः। तत् पुत्रो भूमिमित्रः तस्यापि नारायणः, नारायणस्य सुशर्मा, एते काण्वायनाश्चत्वारः पञ्चचत्वारिंशद्वर्षाणि भूपतयो भविष्यन्ति।

Devabhūti, the last Śuṅga prince, being addicted to immortal indulgences, his minister, the Kāṇva named Vasudeva will murder him and usurp the kingdom : his son will be Bhūmimitra; his son will be Nārāyaṇa; his son will be Suśarman. Thcse four Kāṇvas will be kings of the earth for forty-five years.[38]

Suśarman the Kāṇva will be killed by a powerful servant named Śipraka, of the Āndhra tribe, who will become king and found the Āndhrabhṛtya dynasty;[39] he will be succeeded by his brother Kṛṣṇa;[40] his son will be Śrī Śātakarṇi;[41] his son will be Pūrnotsaṅga;[42] his son will be Śātakarṇi (2nd);[43] his son will be Lambodara;[44] his son will be Ivīlaka;[45] his son will be Meghasvāti;[46] his son will be Patumat;[47] his son will be Ariṣṭ akarman;[48] his son will be Hāla;[49] his son will be Tālaka;[50] his son will be Pravilasena;[51] his son will be Sundara, named Śātakarṇi;[52] his son will be Cakora Śātakarṇi;[53] his son will be Śivasvāti;[54] his son will be Gomatīputra;[55] his son will be Pulimat;[56] his son will be Śivaśrī Śātakarṇi;[57] his son will Śivaskandha;[58] his son will be Yajñaśrī;[59] his son will be Vijaya;[60] his son will be Candraśrī;[61] his son will be Pulomārciṣ.[62] These thirty Andhrabhṛtya kings will reign four hundred and fifty-ṣix years.[63]

After these, various races will reign, as seven Ābhīras, ten Garddhabas, sixteen Śakas, eight Yavanas, fourteen Tuṣāras, thirteen Muṇḍas, eleven Maunas, altogether seventy-nine princes,[64] who will be sovereigns of the earth for one thousand three hundred and ninety years; and then eleven Pauras will be kings for three hundred years.[65] When they are destroyed, the Kailakila Yavanas will be kings; the chief of whom will be Vindhyaśakti; his son will be Parañjaya; his son will be Rāmacandra; his son will be Adharma, from whom will be Varāṅga, Kṛtanandana, Śudhinandī, Nandiyaśas, Śiśuka and Pravīra; these will rule for a hundred and six years.[66] From them will proceed thirteen sons; then three Bāhlīkas and Puṣpamitra, Pātumitra and others, to the number of thirteen, will rule over Mekalā.[67] There will be nine kings in the seven Kośalas; and there will be as many Naiṣadha princes.[68]

In Magadha a sovereign named Viśvasphaṭ ika will establish other tribes; he will extirpate the Kṣatriya or martial race and elevate fishermen, barbarians and Brāhmaṇas and other castes, to power.[69] The nine Nāgas will reign in Padmāvatī, Kāntipurī and Mathurā; and the Guptas of Magadha along the Ganges to Prayāga.[70] A prince named Devarakṣita will reign, in a city on the sea-shore, over the Kośalas, Oḍras, Puṇḍras and Tāmraliptas.[71] The Guhas will possess Kāliṅga, Māhihaka and the mountains of Mahendra.[72] The race of Maṇidhanu will occupy the countries of the Niṣādas, Naimiṣikas and Kālatoyas.[73] The people called Kanaks will possess the Amazon country and that called Mūṣika.[74] Men of the three tribes, but degraded and Ābhīras and Śūdras, will occupy Śaurāṣṭra, Avanti, Śūra, Arbuda and Marubhūmi and Śūdras, outcastes and barbarians will be masters of the banks of the Indus, Dārvika, the Candrabhāgā and Kāshmir.[75]

These will all be contemporary monarchs, reigning over the earth; kings of churlish spirit, violent, temper and ever addicted to falsehood and wickedness. They will inflict death on women, children and cows; they will seize upon the property of their subjects; they will be of limited power and will for the most part rapidly rise and fall; their lives will be short, their desires insatiable and they will display but little piety.

The people of the various countries intermingling with them will follow their example and the barbarians being powerful in the patronage of the princes, whilst purer tribes are neglected, the people will perish.[76]

Wealth and piety will decrease day by day, until the world will be wholly depraved. Then property alone will confer rank; wealth will be the only source of devotion; passion will be the sole bond of union between the sexes; falsehood will be the only means of success in litigation; and women will be objects merely of sensual gratification. Earth will be venerated but for its mineral treasures;[77] the Brahmanical thread will constitute a Brāhmaṇa; external types (as the staff and red garb) will be the only distinctions of the several orders of life; dishonesty will be the universal means of subsistence; weakness will be the cause of dependence; menace and presumption will be substituted for learning; liberality will be devotion; simple ablution will be purification;[78] mutual assent will be marriage; fine clothes will be dignity;[79] and water afar off will be esteemed a holy spring. Amidst all castes he who is the strongest will reign over a principality thus vitiated by many faults. The people, unable to bear the heavy burdens imposed upon them by their avaricious sovereigns, will take refuge amongst the valleys of the mountains and will be glad to feed upon wild honey, herbs, roots, fruits, flowers and leaves : their only covering will be the bark of trees and they will be exposed to the cold and wind and sun and rain. No man's life will exceed three and twenty years. Thus in the Kali age shall decay constantly proceed, until the human race approaches its annihilation.

When the practices taught by the Vedas and the institutes of law shall nearly have ceased and the close of the Kali age shall be nigh, a portion of that divine being who exists of his own spiritual nature in the character of Brahma and who is the beginning and the end and who comprehends all things, shall descend upon earth : he will be born in the family of Viṣṇuyaśas, an eminent Brāhmaṇa of Sambhala village, as Kalki, endowed with the eight superhuman faculties. By his irresistible might he will destroy all the Mlecchas and thieves and all whose minds are devoted to iniquity.

He will then re-establish righteousness upon earth; and the minds of those who live at the end of the Kali age shall be awakened and shall be as pellucid as crystal.

The men who are thus changed by virtue of that peculiar time shall be as the seeds of human beings and shall give birth to race who shall follow the laws of the Kṛta age or age of purity.

अत्रोच्यते

यदा चन्द्रश्च सूर्यश्च तथा तिष्य-बृहस्पती।
एकराशौ समेष्यन्ति भविष्यति तदा कृतम्॥ ३०॥

As it is said : "When the sun and moon and the lunar astrism Tiṣya and the planet Jupiter, are in one mansion, the Kṛta age shall return.[80]"

अतीता वर्त्तमानाश्च तथैवानागताश्च ये।
एते वंशेषु भूपालाः कथिता मुनिसत्तम॥ ३१॥
यावत् परीक्षितो जन्म यावन्नन्दाभिषेचनम्।
एतद्वर्षसहस्रन्तु ज्ञेयं पञ्चदशोत्तरम्॥ ३२॥

Thus, most excellent Muni, the kings who are past, who are present and who are to be, have been enumerated. From the birth of Parīkṣit to the coronation of Nanda it is to be known that 1015 years have elapsed.[81]

सप्तर्षीणाञ्च यौ पूर्वौ दृश्येते उदितौ दिवि।
तयोस्तु मध्यनक्षत्रं दृश्यते यत् समं निशि।
तेन सप्तर्षयो युक्तास्तिष्ठन्त्यब्दशतं नृणाम्॥ ३३॥

When the two first stars of the seven Ṛṣis (the great bear) rise in the heavens and some lunar asterism is seen at night at an equal distance between them, then the seven Ṛṣis continue stationary in that conjunction for hundred years of men.[82]

ते तु पारीक्षिते काले मघास्वासन् द्विजोत्तम।

वसुदेवकुलोद्भूतस्तदैव कलिरागतः॥ ३५॥

At the birth of Parīkṣit they were in Maghā and the Kali age then commenced, which consists of 1200 (divine) years. When the portion of Viṣṇu (that had been born from Vasudeva) returned to heaven, then the Kali age commenced.

यावत् स पादपद्माभ्यां पस्पर्शेमां वसुन्धराम्।

तत्याज सानुजो राज्यं धर्मपुत्रो युधिष्ठिरः॥ ३७॥

As long as the earth was touched by his sacred feet, the Kali age could not affect it. As soon as the incarnation of the eternal Viṣṇu had departed, the son of Dharma, Yudhiṣṭhira, with his brethren, abdicated the sovereignty.

Observing unpropitious portents, consequent upon Kṛṣṇa's disappearance, be placed Parīkṣit upon the throne. When the seven Ṛṣis are in Pūrvāṣāḍhā, then Nanda will begin to reign[83] and thence-forward the influence of the Kali will augment.

निःशेषेण ततस्तस्मिन् भविष्यति पुनः कृतम्॥ ४२॥

The day that Kṛṣṇa shall have departed from the earth will be the first of the Kali age, the duration of which you shall hear; it will continue for 360,000 years of mortals. After twelve hundred divine years shall have elapsed, the Kṛta age shall be renewed.

Thus age after age Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas, Vaiśyas and Śūdras, excellent Brāhmaṇa, men of great souls, have passed away by thousands; whose names and tribes and families I have not enumerated to you, from their great number and the repetition of appellations it would involve. Two persons, Devāpi of the race of Puru and Maru of the family of Ikṣvāku, through the force of devotion continue alive throughout the whole four ages, residing at the village of Kalāpa; they will return hither in the beginning of the Kṛta age and becoming members of the family of the Manu, give origin to the Kṣatriya dynasties.[84] In this manner the earth is possessed through every series of the three first ages, the Kṛta, Tretā and Dvāpara, by the sons of the Manu; and some remain in the Kali age, to serve as the rudiments of renewed generations, in the same way as Devāpi and Maru are still in existence.

I have now given you a summary account of the sovereigns of the earth; to recapitulate the whole would be impossible even in a hundred lives. These and other kings, who with perishable frames have possessed this ever-during world and who, blinded with deceptive notions of individual occupation, have indulged the feeling that suggests, "This earth is mine–it is my son's–it belongs to my dynasty," have all passed away. So, many who reigned before them, many who succeeded them and many who are yet to come, have ceased or will cease, to be. Earth laughs, as if smiling with autumnal flowers, to behold her kings unable to effect the subjugation of themselves. I will repeat to you, Maitreya, the stanzas that were chanted by Earth and which the Muni Asita communicated to Janaka, whose banner was virtue.

Pṛthvī said– "How great is the folly of princes, who are endowed with the faculty of reason, to cherish the confidence of ambition, when they themselves are but foam upon the wave. Before they have subdued themselves, they seek to reduce their ministers, their servants, their subjects, under their authority; they then endeavour to overcome their foes.

कियदात्मजयादेतन्मुक्तिरात्मजये फलम्॥५८॥

'Thus,' say they, 'will we conquer the ocean-circled earth ;' and, intent upon their project, behold not death, which is not far off. But what mighty matter is the subjugation of the sea-girt earth to one who can subdue himself. Emancipation from existence is the fruit of self-control.

It is through infatuation that kings desire to possess me, whom their predecessors have been forced to leave, whom their fathers have not retained. Beguiled by the selfish love of sway, fathers contend with sons and brothers with brothers, for my possession. Foolishness has been the character of every king who has boasted, 'All this earth is mine–everything is mine–it will be in my house for ever;' for he is dead. How is it possible that such vain desires should survive in the hearts of his descendants, who have seen their progenitor, absorbed by the thirst of dominion, compelled to relinquish me, whom he called his own and tread the path of dissolution?

पृथ्वी ममैषाशु परित्यजैनां वदन्ति ये दूतमुखैः स्वशत्रुम्।

When I hear a king sending word to another by his ambassador, 'This earth is mine; immediately resign your pretensions to it;' I am moved to violent laughter at first, but it soon subsides in pity for the infatuated fool."

पराशर उवाच

These were the verses, Maitreya, which Earth recited and by listening to which ambition fades away like snow before the sun. I have now related to you the whole account of the descendants of the Manu; amongst whom have flourished kings endowed with a portion of Viṣṇu, engaged in the preservation of the earth.

Whoever shall listen reverently and with faith to this narrative, proceeding from the posterity of Manu, shall be purified entirely from all his sins and, with the perfect possession of his faculties, shall live in unequalled affluence, plenty and prosperity. He who has heard of the races of the sun and moon, of Ikṣvāku, Jahnu, Mandhātri, Sagara and Raghu, who have all perished; of Yayāti, Nahuṣa and their posterity, who are no more; of kings of great might, resistless valour and unbounded wealth, who have been overcome by still more powerful time and are now only a tale; he will learn wisdom and forbear to call either children or wife or house or lands or wealth, his own.

Aware of this truth, a wise man will never be influenced by the principle of individual appropriation; and regarding them as only transient and temporal possessions, he will not consider children and posterity, lands and property or whatever else is personal, to be his own.

3. 24 years V.; Tilaka or Bālaka, 28, M.
4. 50 years V.; 53, M.
5. Ajaka, 21 years V.; Sūryaka, 21, M.; Rajaka, Bhāgavata.
6. 20 years V. and M.
7. This number is also specified by the Vāyu and Bhāgavata and the several years of the reigns of the former agree with the total. The particulars of the Matsya compose 145 years, but there is no doubt some mistake in them.
8. Śiśunāka, who according to the Vāyu and Matsya relinquished Banārasa to his son and established himself at Girivraja or Rājgṛha in Bihar, reigns 40 years V. and M.
9. 36 years V. and M.
10. Kṣemakarman, 20 years V.; Kṣemadharman, 36, M.
11. 40 years V.; Kṣemajit or Kṣemārcis, 36, M.; Kṣetrajña, Bhāgavata.
12. Vimbisara, 28 years V.; Vindusena or Vindhyasena, 28, M.; Vidhisāra, Bhāgavata.
13. 25 years V.; 27, M.; but the latter inserts a Kaṇvāyana, 9 years and Bhūmimitra or Bhūmiputra, 14 years before him. In this and the preceding name we have appellations of considerable celebrity in the traditions of the Buddhists. Vidmisāra, read also Vindhusāra, Vilvisāra, etc., is most probably their Vimbasāra, who was born at the same time with Śākya and was reigning at Rājgṛha when the began his religious career. The Mahāvaṁśa says that Siddhatto and Bimbisaro were attached friends, as their fathers had been before them. Śākya is said to have died in the reign of Ajātaśatru, the son of Vimbasāra, in the eighth year of his reign. The Vāyu transposes these names and the Matsya still more alters and order of Ajātaśatru; but the Bhāgavata concurs with our text. The Buddhist authority differs from the Purāṇas materially as to the duration of the reigns, giving to Bimbisaro 52 years and to Ajatasattu 32 : the latter, according to the same, murdered his father. Mahāvaṁśa, p. 10. We may therefore with some confidence claim for these princes a date of about six centuries B.C. They are considered contemporary with Sudhoddhana, in the list of the Aikṣvākavas (p. Bk. IV. Ch. XXII. n. 20).

14. Harṣaka, 25 years V.; Vansaka, 24, M.

15. 33 years V.; Udibhi or Udāsin, 33, M. According to the Vāyu, Udaya or Udayāśva founded Kusumapur or Pāṭaliputra, on the southern angle of the Ganges : स वै पुरवरं राजा पृथिव्यां कुसुमाह्वयं। गंगायाः दक्षिणेकोणे चतुर्थेऽब्दे करिष्यति॥ The legends of Śākya, consistently with this tradition, take no notice of this city in his peregrinations on either bank of the Ganges. The Mahāvaṁśa calls the son and successor of Ajātaśatru, Udayibhadako (Udayinbhadraka) : Bk. I. Ch. II.

16. 42 and 43 years V.; 40 and 43, M. The Mahāvaṁśa has in place of these, Anuruddhako, Mundo and Nāgadāso; all in succession patricides : the last deposed by an insurrection of the people.

17. The several authorities agree in the number of ten Śaiśunāgas and in the aggregate years of their reigns, which the Matsya and the Bhāgavata call 360 : the Vāyu has 362, with which the several periods correspond : the details of the Matsya give 363. The Vāyu and Matsya call the Śaiśunāgas, Kṣatrabandhus, which may designate an inferior order of Kṣatriyas : they also observe, that contemporary with the dynasties already specified, the Pauravas, the Vārhadrathas and Māgadhas, there were other races of royal descent; as, Aikṣvākava princes, 24 : Pāncālas, 25, V.; 27, M. : Kālakas or Kāsakas or Kāseyas, 24 : Haihayas, 24, V.; 28, M.: Kāliṅgas, 32, V.; 40, M. : Śakas, V.; Aśmakas, M, 25 : Kuravas, 26 : Maithilas, 28 : Sūrasenas, 23 : and Vitihotras, 20.

18. The Bhāgavata calls him Mahāpadmapati, the lord of Mahāpadma; which the commentator interprets, 'sovereign of an infinite host' or 'of immense wealth;' Mahāpadma signifying 100,000 millions. The Vāyu and Matsya, however, consider Mahāpadma as another name of Nanda.

19. So the Bhāgavata also; but it would be more compatible with chronology to consider the nine Nandas as so many descents. The Vāyu and Matsya give eighty-eight years to Mahāpadam and only the remaining twelve to Sumālya and the rest of the remaining eight; these twelve years being occupied with the efforts of Kauṭilya to expel the Nandas. The Mahāvaṁśa, evidently intending the same events, gives names and circumstances differently : it may be doubted if with more accuracy. On the disposal of Nāgadāsa, the people raised to the throne the minister Susunāgo, who reigned eighteen years. This prince is evidently confounded with the Śiśunāga of the Purāṇas. He was succeeded by his son Kālāsoka, who reigned twenty years; and he was succeeded by his sons, ten of whom reigned together for twenty-two years : subsequently there were nine, who, according to their seniority, reigned for twenty-two years. The Brāhmaṇa Canaka put the ninth surviving brother, named Dhana Nando (Rich-Nanda), to death and installed Chandagupta Mahāvaṁśa p. 15 and 21. These particulars, notwithstanding the alteration of some of the names, belong clearly to one story; and that of the Buddhists looks as if it was borrowed and modified from that of the Brāhmaṇas. The commentary on the Mahāvaṁśa, translated by Turnour (Introduction, p. xxxviii), calls the sons of Kālāsoka the 'nine Nandas;' but another Buddhist authority, the Dīpavaṁśa, omits Kālāsoko and says that Susunāgo had ten brothers, who after his demise reigned collectively twenty-two years. Journal of the As. Soc. Of Bengal Nov. 1838, p. 930.

20. For the particulars of the story here alluded to see the Mudrā Rākṣasa, Hindu Theatre, vol. II. Kauṭilya is also called, according to the commentator on out text, Vātsyāyana, Viṣṇugupta and Cāṇakya. According to the Matsya Purāṇa, Kauṭilya retained the regal authority for a century but there is some inaccuracy in the copies.

21. This is the most important name in all the lists, as it can scarcely be doubted that he is the Sandrocottus or as Athenaeus writes more correctly, the Sandrocoptus, of the Greeks, as I have endeavoured to prove in the introduction to the Mudrā Rākṣasa. The relative position of Candragupta, Vidmisāra or Bimbisāra and Ajātaśatru, serve to confirm the identification. Śākya was contemporary with both the latter, dying in the eighth year of Ajātaśatru reign. The Mahāvaṁśa says he reigned twenty-four years afterwards; but the Vāyu makes his whole reign but twenty-five years, which would place the close of it B.C. 526. The rest of the Śaiśunāga dynasty, according to the Vāyu and Matsya, reigned 143 or 140 years; bringing their close to B.C. 383. Another century being deducted for the duration of the Nandas, would place the accession of Candragupta B.C. 283. Candragupta was the contemporary of Seleucus Nicator, who began this reign B.C. 310 and concluded a treaty with him B.C. 305. Although therefore his date may not be made out quite correctly from the Paurāṇik premises, yet the error cannot be more than twenty or thirty years. The result is much nearer the truth than that furnished by Buddhist authorities. According to the Mahāvaṁśa a hundred years had elapsed from the death of Buddha to the tenth year of the reign of Kālāsoko. He reigned other ten years and his son s forty-four, making of total of 154 years between the death of Śākya and the accession of Candragupta which is consequently placed B.C. 389 or above seventy years too early. According to the Buddhist authorities, Chan-ta-kutta or Candragupta commenced his reign 396 B.C. Burmese Table; Prinsep's Useful Tables. Turnour, in his Introduction, giving to Kālāsoko eighteen years subsequent to the century after Buddha, places Candragupta's accession B.C. 381, which, he observes, is sixty years too soon; dating, however, the accession of Candragupta from 323 B.C or immediately upon Alexander's death, a period too early by eight or ten years at least. The discrepancy of dates, turnour is disposed to think, proceeds from some intentional perversion of the Buddhistical chronology. Introduction P.L. The commentator on our text says that Candragupta was the son of Nanda by a wife named Murā, whence he and his descendants were called Mauryas : चन्द्रगुप्तं नन्दस्यव पत्न्यन्तरस्य मुरासञ्ज्ञस्य पुत्रं मौर्य्याणां प्रथमं। Tod considers Maurya a corruption of Mori, the name of a Rajput tribe. The Tīka on the Mahāvaṁśa builds a story on the fancied resemblance of the word to Mayūra, S. Mori, Pr. 'a peacock'. There being abundance of pea-fowl in the place where the Śākya tribe built a town, they called it Mori and there princes were thence called Mauryas. Turnour, Introduction to the Mahāvaṁśa, p. xxxix. Candragupta reigned, according to the Vāyu P., 24 years; according to the Mahāvaṁśa, 34; to the Dīpavasanśo, 24.

22. So the Mahāvaṁśa, Bindusāra. Burmese Table, Bin-tu-sara. The Vāyu has Bhadraśāra, 25 years; the Bhāgavata, Vārisāra. The Matsya names but four princes of this race, although it concurs with the others in stating the series to consist of ten. The names are also differently arranged and one is peculiar : they are, Śatadhanvan, Vṛhadratha, Śuka and Daśaratha.

23. Aśoka, 36 years, Vāyu; Śuka, 26, Matsya; Aśokavarddhana, Bhāgavata; Aśoka and Dhammaśoka, Mahāvaṁśa. This king is the most celebrated of any in the annals of the Buddhists. In the commencement of his reign he followed the Brahmanical faith, but became a convert to that of Buddha and a zealous encourager of it. He is said to have maintained in his palace 64,000 Buddhist priests and to have erected 84,000 columns or topes throughout India. A great convocation of Buddhist priests was held in the eighteenth year of his reign, which was followed by missions of Ceylon and other places. According to Buddhist chronology he ascended the throne 218 years after the death of Buddha, B.C. 325. As the grandson of Candragupta, however, he must have been some time subsequent to this or agreeably to the joint duration of the reigns of Candragupta and Bindusāra, supposing the former to have commenced his reign about B.C. 315, forty-nine years later or B.C. 266. The duration of his reign is said to have been thirty-six years, bringing it down to B.C. 230 : but if we deduct these periods from the date assignable to Candragupta, of B.C. 283, we shall place Aśoka's reign from B.C. 234 to 198. Now it is certain that a number of very curious inscriptions, on columns and rocks, by a Buddhist prince, in an ancient form of letter and the Pāli language, exist in India; and that some of them refer to Greek princes, who can be no other than members of the Seleucidan and ptolemaean dynasties and are probably Antiochus the Great and Ptolemy Euergetes, kings of Syria and Egypt in the latter part of the third century before Christ. Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, February and March, 1838. The Indian king appears always under the appellation Piyadaśī or Priyadarśīn, 'the beautiful;' and his entitled Devānam-piya, 'the beloved of the gods.' According to Buddhist authorities, the Rasavāhinī and Dīpavaṁśa, quoted by Turnour (J. As. Soc. Of Bengal, Dec., 1837, p. 1056 and Nov. 1838, p. 930), Piyadaśī or Piyadaśano is identificd both by name and circumstances with Aśoka and to him therefore the inscriptions must be attributed. Their purpose agrees well enough with his character and their wide diffusion with the traditionally report of the number of his monuments. His date is not exactly that of Antiochus the great, but it is not very far different and the corrections required to make it correspond are no more than the inexact manner in which both Brahmanical and Buddhist chronology is preserved may well be expected to render necessary.

24. The name of Daśaratha, in a similar ancient character as that of Piyadaśī's inscriptions, has been found at Gayā amongst Buddhist remains and like them deciphered by Prinsep, Journal, As. Society Bengal, August, 1837, p. 677. A different series of names occur in the Vāyu; or Kuśala, 8 years; Bandhupālita, Indrapālita, Daśavarman, 7 years; Śatadhara, 8 years; and Vṛhadaśva, 7 years. The Bhāgavata agrees in most of the names and its omission of Daśaratha is corrected by the commentator.

25. Śatadhanvan, Bhāgavata.

26. The Vāyu says nine Sumūrttyas reigned 137 years. The Matsya and Bhāgavata have ten Mauryas and 137 years. The detailed numbers of the Vāyu and Matsya differ from their totals, but the copies are manifestly corrupt.

27. The Bhāgavata omits this name, but states that there were ten Śuṅgas, although, without Puṣ pamitra, only nine are named. The Vāyu and Matsya have the same account of the circumstances of his accession to the throne; the former gives him a reign of sixty, the latter of thirty-six years. In a play attributed to Kālidāsa, the Mālavikāgnimitra, of which Agnimitra is the hero, his father is alluded to as the Senānī or general, as if he had deposed his master in favour, not of himself, but of his son. Agnimitra is termed king of Vidiśā, not of Magadha. Puṣpamitra is represented as engaged in a conflict with the Yavanas on the Indus; thus continuing the political rclations with the Greeks or Scythians of Bactria and Ariana. See Hindu Theatre, vol. I. 347.

28. 8 years V.; omitted M.

29. 7 years V. and M.; but the latter places him after Vasumitra; and in the drama the son of Agnimitra is called Vasumitra.

30. 8 years V.; 10 years M.

31. Andraka, V. Antaka, M. : they agree in his reign, 2 years, Bhadraka, Bhāgavata.

32. 3 years V. and M.

33. 3 years V.; omitted, M.; Ghoṣa, Bhāgavata.

34. 9 years M.

35. Bhāgavata M.; 32 years V. and M.

36. Kṣemabhūmi, V.; Devabhūmi, M.; 10 years both.

37. The Bhāgavata says, 'more than a hundred,' शताधिकं। The commentator explains it 112, द्वादशाधिकं। The Vāyu and Matsya have the same period.

38. The names of the four princes agree in all the authorities. The Matsya transfers the character of Vyasanī to the minister, with the further addition of his being a Brāhmaṇa; Dvija. In the lists given by Jones and Wilford, the four Kāṇvas are said to have reigned 345 years; but in seven copies of the Viṣṇu Purāṇa, from different parts of India, the number is, as given in the text, forty-five : एते काण्वायनाश्चत्वार: पंचचत्वारिंशद्वर्षाणि भूपतयो भविष्यन्ति। There is however authority for the larger number, both in the text of thc Bhāgavata and the comment. The former has, काण्वायना इमे भूमिं चत्वारिंशच्च पंचच। शतानि त्रीणि भोक्ष्यन्ति वर्षाणां च कलौ युगे॥ and the latter, काण्वायनाश्चवर्षाणां त्रीणिशतानि पंचतत्वारिंशद्वर्षाणि भूमिं भोक्ष्यन्ति। There is no doubt therefore of the purpose of the text; and it is only surprising that such a chronology should have been inserted in the Bhāgavata, not only in opposing to all probability, but to other authority. The Vāyu and Matsya not only confirm the lower number by stating it as a total, but by giving it in detail; thus : Vasudeva will reign 9 years, Bhūmimitra, 14, Nārāyaṇa, 12 and Suśarman, 10. Total - 45. And six copies of the Matsya concur in this statement.

39.The exprcssions Andhrajātiyas and Andharbhṛtyas have much perplexed Wilford, who makes three races out of one Āndhras, Andharjātiyas and Andharbhṛtyas. As. Res. IX. 101. There is no warrant for three races in the Purāṇas, although the Matsya and perhaps the Vāyu, distinguishes two, as we shall hereafter see. Our text has but one, to which all the terms may be applied. The first of the dynasty was an Āndhra by birth or caste (jātiya) and servant (bhṛtyas) of the last of the Kāṇva reace. So the Vāyu; सिन्धुकोह्यन्ध्रजातीयः। the Matsya; काण्वायनस्तदा भृत्यः सुशर्म्माणं प्रसह्य तं शिशुकोऽन्ध्रः सजातीयः प्रप्स्यतीमां वसुन्धरां। and the Bhāgavatas; हत्वाकाण्वं सुशर्म्माणं तद्भृत्यौ वृषलो बलो गां भोक्ष्यत्यन्ध्रजातीयः कंचित्कालंमसत्रम्। The terms 'an Andhra by caste' and 'a Bhṛtya or srvant,' with the additon, in the last passage, of Vṛṣala, 'a Śūdra,' all apply to one person and one dynasty. Wilfor has made wild work with his triad. The name of the first of this race is variously read : Sindhuka, Vāyu; Śiśuka, Matsya; Balin, Bhāgavata; and according to Wilfor, Chismaka in the Brahmāṇḍa P. and Śūdraka or Śūraka in the Kumārikā Khaṇḍa of the Skanda Purāṇa As. Res. IX. 107. He reigned 23 years, Vāyu and Matsya. If the latter form of his name be correct, he may be the king who is spoken of in the prologue to the Mṛcchakaṭī.

40. 10 years V.; 18, M.

41. 56 years V.; 18, M.; 10, Brahmāṇḍa, Wilfor; Simālakarṇi, Matsya; Śantakarṇa, Bhāgavata.

42. Omitted. V.; 18 years, M.; Paurnamāsa, Bhāgvata.

43. Omitted, V. and Bhāgavata; 56 years m.; but the latter has before him a Śrīvasvāni, 18 years.

44. 18 years M.

45. Apilaka, 12 years V. and M.; Civilika or Vivilika, Bhāgavata.

46. Omitted, V. and M.

47. Patumāvi, 24 years V.; Dṛrhamāna, Bhāgavata.

48. Nemi Kṛṣṇa, 25 years. V.; Ariṣṭa-karṇi, 25 years M.

49. Hāla, 1 year V.; 5 years. M.; Hāleya, Bhāgavata.

50. Mandalaka, 5 years M.; omitted, Bhāgavata.

51. Purīṣasena, 21 years V.; Purindrasena, 5 years, Matsya; Purīṣataru, Bhāgavata.

52. Śātakarṇi only, V. and M.; the first give him three years, the second but one. Sunanda, Bhāgavata.

53. Cakora, 6 months, V.; Vikarṇi, 6 months, M.

54. 28 years V. and M.

55. Gautamīputra, 21 years V. and M.

56. Pulomat, 28 years M.; Purimat, Bhāgavata.

57. Omitted, V.; 7 years M.; Medhaśiras, Bhāgavata.

58. Omitted, V.; 7 years, M.

59. 29 years V.; 9 years M.

60. 6 years V. and M.

61. Daṇḍaśrī, 3 years V.; Candraśrī, 10 years M.; Candravijaya, Bhāgavata.

62. Pulovāpi 7 years V.; Pulomat, 7 years M.; Sulomadhi, Bhāgavata.

63. The Vāyu and Bhāgavata state also 30 kings and 456 years; the Matsya has 29 kings and 460 years. The actual enumeration of the text gives but 24 names; that of the Bhāgavata but 23; that of the Vāyu but 17. The Matsya has the whole 29 names, adding several to the list of our text; and the aggregate of the rcigns amounts of 435 years and 6 months. The difference between this and the total specified arises probaly from some inaccuracy in the MSS. As this list appears to be fuller than any other, it may be advisable to insert it as it occurs in the Radcliffe copy of the Matsya Puraṇa -

1. Śiśuka, 23 years, 2. Kṛṣṇa, 18, 3. Simalakarṇi, 18, 4. Purnotsaṅga, 18, 5. Śrīvasvāni, 18, 6. Śātakarṇi, 56, 7. Lambodara, 18, 8. Apītaka, 12, 9. Saṅgha, 18, 10. Śātakarṇi, 18, 11. Skandhasvāti, 7, 12. Mṛgendra, 3, 13. Kuntalasvāti, 8, 14. Svātikarṇa, 1, 15. Pulomāvit, 36, 16. Goraksāśvaśrī, 25, 17. Hāla, 5, 18. Mantalaka, 5, 19. Purindrasena, 5, 20. Rajādasvāti, 6 months, 21. Śivaśvāti, 28, 22. Gautamiputra, 21, 23. Pulomat, 28, 24. Śivaśrī, 7, 25. Skandhasvāti, 7, 26. Yajñaśrī, 9, 27. Vijaya, 6, 28. Vadaśrī, 10, 29. Pulomat, 7. Total 435 years 6 month. Several of the names vary in this list from those in my copy. The adjuncts Svāti and Śātikarṇā appear to be conjoined or not with the other appellations, according to the convenience of the metre and seem to be the family designations or titles. The dynasty is of considerable chronological interest, as it admits of some plausible verifications. That powerful race of Andhra princes ruled in India in the beginning of the Christian era, we learn from Pliny, who describes them as possessed of thirty fortified cities, with an army of 100,000 men and 1000 elephants. The Andhra of this writer are probably the people of the upper part of the peninsula, Andhra being the proper designation of Teliṅgana. The Peutingerian tables, however, place the Andre-Indi on the banks of the Ganges and the southern princes may have extended or shifted the site of their power. Towrds the close of the dynasty we find names that appear to agree with those of princes of middle India, of whom mention is made by the Chinese; as, Yue-gnai (Yajñaśrī), king of Kiapili, A.D. 408; Des Guignes, I. 45; and Ho-lo-mien (Pulomān), king of Magadha in 621; ibid, I. 56. The Paurāṇik lists place these two princes more nearly together, but we cannot rely implicitly upon their accuracy. Calculating from Candragupta downwards, the Indian date of Yajña and the Chinese Yue-gnai corresponds; for we have, 10 Mauryas, 137 years 10 Śuṅgas, 112. 4 Kaṇvas, 45. 27 Andhras, 437. Total 731. Deduct for Candragupta's date 312 B.C. Total 419 A.C. A date remarkably near that derivable from the Chinese annals. If the Indian Pulomān be the same with the Chinese Ho-lo-mien, there must be some considerable omission in the Paurāṇik dynasty. There is a farther identification in the case of Ho-lo-mien, which makes it certain that a prince of Magadha is intended, as the place of his residence is called by the Chinesc Kia-so-mo-pulo-ching and Potoli-tse-ching; or in Sanskrit, Kusuma-pura and Pāṭali-putra. The equivalent of the latter name consists, not only in the identiy of the sounds Pāṭali and Po-to-li, but in the translation of 'putra' by 'tse'; each word meaning in their respective languages 'son'. No doubt can be entertained therefore that the city intended is the metropolis of Magadha, Pāṭ aliputra or Pali-bothra. Wilform identifies Pulomat or Pulomān with the Po-lo-muen of the Chinese; but Des Guignes interprets Po-lo-muen kue, 'royaume des Brahmanes'. Buchanan (Hamilton), following the Bhāgavata as to the name of the last king, Sulomadhi, would place him about A.D. 846; but his premises are far from accurte and his deduction in this instance at least is of no weight. Geneal. of the Hindus, Introduction p. 16. He supposes the Andhra kings of Magadha to have retained their power on the Ganges until the Mohammedan invasion or the twelfth century, when they retired to the south and reigned at Warankal in Teliṅgānā. Inscriptions and coins, however, confirm the statement of the Purāṇa, that a different dynasty succeeded to the Andhras some centuries before the Mohammedan conquests; and the Chines also record, that upon the death of thc king of Magadha, Ho-lo-mien (Puloman?), some time before A.D. 648, great troubles in India took place. Des Guignes. Some very curious and authentic testimony to the actual existence of these Andhra kings has been lately afforded by the discovery of an ancient inscription in Gujarat, in which Rudra Dāmā, the Kṣatrapa or Satrap of Surāṣ ṭra, is recorded to have repeatedly overcome Śātakarṇi, king of the southern country (Dakṣ iṇapatha). The inscription is with out date, but it is in an old character and makes mention of the two Maurya princes, Candragupta and Aśoka, as if not very long prior to its composition. Prinsep, to whom we are indebted for the deciphering and translating of this important document, has been also successfull in deciphering the legends on a series of coins belonging to the princes of Surāṣṭra, amongst whom the name of Rudra Dāmā occurs; and he is inclined, although with hesitation, to place these princes about a century after Aśoka or Rudra Dāmā abcut 153 B.C. J. As. Soc. Bengal, May 1837 and April 1838. According to the computation hazarded above from our text, the race of Andhra kings should not commence till about 20 years B.C., which would agree with Pliny's notice of them; but it is possible that they existed earlier in the south of India, although they established their authority in Magadha only in the first centuries of the Christian era.

64. These parallel dynasties are thus particularised in our other authorities :

Abhīras, 7, M.; 10, V.; kings of Avabhṛti, 7, Bhāgavata Garddabhins, 10, M. V. Bhāgavata Śakas, 18, M.V.; Kaṅkas, 16, Bhāgavata Yavanas, 8, M.V. Bhāgavata, Tuṣāras, 14, M.V.; Tuṣkaras, 14, Bhāgavata Marūṇḍas, 13, V.; Purūṇḍos, 13, M.; Surūṇḍas, 10, Bhāgavata Mannas, 18, V.; Hūṇas, 19, M.; Maulas, 11, Bhāgavata. Total 85 kings, Vāyu; 89, Matsya; 76 and 1399 years, Bhāgavata.

The other two authorities give the years of each dynasty severally. The numbers are apparently intendcd to be the same, but those of the Matsya are palpable blunders, although almost all the MSS. agree in the reading. The chronology of the Vāyu is Abhīras, 67 years; Garddabhins, 72; Śakas, 380; Yavanas, 82; Tuṣāras, 500 (all the copies of the Matsya have 7000); Marūṇḍas, 200; and Mlecchas, intending perhaps Maunas, 300 years. Total 1601 years or less than 19 years to a reign. They are not however continuous, but nearly contemporary dynasties; and if they comprise, as they probably do, the Greek and Scythian princes of the west of India, the periods may not be very wide of the truth. The Matsya begins the list with one more dynasty, aother Andhra (see n. 39), of whom there were seven : अन्ध्राणां संस्थिते राज्ये तेषां भृत्यान्वया नृपाः। सप्तैवान्ध्रा भविष्यन्ति नवाभीरास्ततो नृपाः॥ 'When the dominion of the Andhras has ceased, there shall be seven other Andhras, kings of the race of their servants; and then nine Abhīras.' etc. The passage of the Vāyu, although somewhat similar in terms, has a different purporse : अन्ध्राणां संस्थितानां च तेषां वंशा समा पुनः। सप्तैवतुभविष्यन्ति-दशाभीरास्ततो नृपाः॥ "Of these, the Andhras having passed away, there shall be seven contemporary races; as, ten Abhīras.' The passage is differently read in different copies, but this is the only intelligible reading. At the same time it subsequently specifies a period for the duration of the Andhra dynasty different from that before given or three hundred years, as if a different race was referred to : अन्ध्रा भीक्ष्यन्ति वसुधां शते द्वे च शतं च वै। 'The Andhras shall possess the earth two hundred years and one hundred.' The Matsya has twice five hundred : अन्ध्रा श्रीपर्व्वतीयाश्च ते द्वे पञ्चशतं समाः। 'The Śrīparvatīya Andhras twice five hundred years.' One MS. has more consistently fifty-two years : द्विपंचाशतं समाः। But there is evidently something faulty in all the MSS. The expression of the Matsya, 'Śrīparvatīya Andhras,' is remarkable; Śrīparvat being in Teliṅgānā. There is probably some confusion of the two races, the Magadha and Tailiṅga kings, in these passages of the Purāṇas. The Bhāgavata has a dynasty of seven Andhra kings, but of a different period (see n. 39). Wilfor has attempted a verification of these dynasties; in some instances perhaps with success, though certainly not in all. The Abhīras he calls the shepherd kings of the north of India : they were more probably Greeks or Scythians or Parthians, along the lower Indua : traces of the name occur, as formelry observed, in the Abiria of Ptolemy and the Ahīrs as a distinct race still exist in Gujarat. Raish Mehfil. The Śakas are the Sace and the duration of their power is not unlikely to be near the truth. The eight Yavana kings may be, as he suppose, Greek princes of Bactria, or rather of western India. The Tuṣāras he makes the Parthians. If the Bhāgavata has the preferable reading Tuṣkāras, they were the Tocari, a Scythian race. The Murūṇḍas, as he has it, Mauruṇḍas, he considers to be a tribe of Huṇs, the Morundae of Ptolemy. According to the Matsya they were of Mleccha origin, Mleccha-saṁbhava. The Vāyu calls them Arya-mlecchas; quere, Barbarians of Ariana. Wilford regards the Maunas as also a tribe of Huṇs; and the word is in all the MSS. of the Matsya, Hūṇas; traces of whom may be still found in the west and south of India. Inscription at Merritch. Jour. R. As. Soc. Vol. III. p. 103. The Garddabhins Wilford conjectures to be descendants of Bahram Gor, king of Persia; but this is very questionable. That they were a tribe in the west of India may be conjectured, as some strange tales prevail there of a Gandharva, changed to an ass, marrying the daughter of the king of Dhār. As. Res. VI. 35 and IX. 147; also 'Cutch' by Mrs. Postans, p. 18 : fables suggested no doubt by the name Garddabha, signifying as ass. There is also evidently some affinity between these Garddabhins and the old Gadhia Pysa or assmoney, as vulgarly termed, found in various parts of western India and which is unquestionably of ancient date. Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, Dec. 1835, p. 688. It may be the coinage of the Garddabha princes; Garddabha, being the original of Gadhā, meaning also an ass. I have elsewhere conjectured the possibility of their being current about a century and a half before our era. Journ. R. As. Soc. Vol. III. 385. Tod, quoting a parallel passage in Hindi, reads, instead of Garddhabhin, Gor-ind, which he explains the Indras or lords of Gor; but the reading is undoubtedly erroneous.

65. The copies agree in reading Pauras, but the commentator remarks that it is sometimes Maunas, but they have already been specified; unless the term be repeated in order to separate the duration of this dynasty from that of the rest. Such seems to be the purpose of the similar passage of the Bhāgavata. 'These kings (Andhras etc.) will possess the earth 1099 years and the eleven Maulas 300:' एते भोक्ष्यन्ति पृथिवीं दशवर्षशतानि च नवाधिकां च नवतिं मौला एकादश

क्षितिं भोक्ष्यान्त्यब्दशतानि त्रीणि। No such name as Pauras occurs in the other authorities. The analogy of duration identifies them with the Mlecchas of the Vāyu : 'Eleven Mlecchas will possess the earth for three centuries:' शतानि त्रीणि भोक्ष्यन्ते म्लेच्छा एकादशैवतु। and the Vāyu may refer to the Maunas, as no other period is assigned for them. The periods of the Bhāgavata, 1099 and 300, come much to the same as that of our text, 1390; the one including the three centuries of the Maunas, the other stating it separately. The Vāyu apparently adds it to the rest, thus making the total 1601, instead of 1390. It is evident that the same scheme is intended by the several authorities, although some inaccuracy affects either the original statement or the existing manuscripts.

66. Kilakila, Kolakila, Kolikila, Kilinakila, as it is variously read. Sir Wm. Jones's Pandit stated that he understood it to be a city in the Mahratta country (As. Res. XI. 142); and there has been found a confirmation of his belief in an inscription, where Kilagila, as it is there termed, is called the capital of Nārasiṁha Deva, king of the Konkan, Journ, R. As. Soc. Vol. IV. p. 282. This inscription dates A.D. 1058. The Purāṇas refer probably to a long antecedent date, when the Greek princes or their Indo-Scythic successors, following the course of the Indus, spread to the upper part of the western coast of the peninsula. The text calls them Yavanas; and the Vāyu and Matsya say they were Yavanas in institutions, manners and policy : धर्म्मतः कामतोऽर्थतः। The Bhāgavata names five of their princes, Bhūtānanda, Bangiri, Śiśunandī, Yaśonandī and Pravīra, who will reign 106 years and they are therefore imperfect representatives of the series in our text. The Matsya has no farthcr spccific enumeration of any dynasty. The Vāyu makes Pravīra the son of Vindhyaśakti; the latter reigning 96 years and the former 60 : the latter is king of Kāñcanapurī, 'the golden city' and is followed by four sons, whose names are not mentioned. Between Vindhyaśakti and Pravīra, however, a dynasty of king is introduced, some of the names of which resemble those of the Kilakila princes of the text. They are, Bhogin the son of Śeṣanāga, Sadācandra, Nakhavat, Dhanandhamita, Vinśaja, Bhūtinanda–at a period before the end of the Śuṅgas? (the copies have शुंगाना न कुलस्यान्ते)–Madhunandī, his younger brother Nandīyaśas; and in his race there will be three other Rājās, Dauhitra, Śiśuka and Ripukāyān. These are called princes of Vidiśa or Videsa; the latter meaning perhaps 'foreign' and constitute the Nāga dynasty. Our text calls Vindhyaśakti a Murddhābhiṣikta, a warrior of a mixed race, sprung from a Brāhmaṇa father and Kṣatriya mother.

67. The text of this passage runs thus : तन्पुत्रास्त्रयोदशैब वाह्लोकाश्चत्रयस्ततः। पुष्पमित्रपटुमि त्राद्यास्त्रयोदशमेकलाश्च। 'Their sons,' तत्पुत्रा the commentator explains by विन्ध्यशक्त्यांदीनां यथायथं त्रयोदशपुत्राः। 'thirteen sons of Vindhyaśakti and the rest.' The Bhāgavata has a different statement, identifying the sons of the Vindhya race with the Bāhlīkas and making them thirteen : तेषां त्रयोदशसुता भवितारश्चबाह्लीकाः। 'The Bāhlīkas will be their thirteen sons.' As the commentator : भूतनन्दादीनां यथायथं बाह्लीकनामानश्चत्रयोदशसुता भविष्यन्ति। 'There will be severally thirteen sons, called Bāhlīkas, of Bhūtananda and the rest.' The following verse is, पुष्पमित्रो राजन्यः दुर्म्मित्रोऽथ तथैवच। 'Puṣpamitra, a king and then Durmitra :' who or what they were does not appear. The commentator says. Puṣpamitra was another king and Durmitra was his son : पुष्पमित्रोनामाऽन्यो राजन्योऽस्य च दुर्म्मित्रोनाम पुत्रः। Here is evidently careless and inaccurate compilation. The Vāyu, though not quite satisfactory, accords better with our text. 'Pravīra', it says, 'will have four sons : when the Vindhya race is extinct, there will be three Bahlīka kings, Supratīka, Nabhīra, who will reign thirty years and Śakyamānābhava (quere this name), king of the Mahiṣas. The Puṣpamitra will then be and the Patumitras also, who will be seven kings of Mekalā. Such is the generation.' तस्य (प्रवीरस्य) पुत्रास्तु चत्वारो भविष्यन्ति नराधिपाः। विन्ध्यकानां कलेऽतीते नृपा वै बाह्लीकास्त्रयः। सुप्रतीको नभीरश्च समा भोक्ष्यन्ति त्रिंशतीः। शक्यमानाभवो राजा महिषीणां महीपतिः। पुष्पमित्रा भविष्यन्ति यदुमित्रास्तथैवच (or यदुमित्रास्त्रयोदश) मेकलायां नृपाः सप्त भविष्यन्तीति सन्ततिः॥ The plural verb with only two Bāhlīka names indicates some omission, unless we correct it to भोक्ष्येते 'they two will reign;' but the following name and title, Śakyamānābhava, king of the Mahiṣas, seems to have little connection with the Bāhlīka. If, in a subsequent part of the citation, the reading 'trayodaśa' be correct, it must then be thirteen Paṭumitras, but it will be difficult to know what to do with Sapta, 'seven'. If for Saṅtati we might read Saptati, 'seventy,' the sense might be, 'these thirteen kings ruled for seventy-seven years.'

However this may be, it seems correct to separate the thirteen sons or families of the Vindhya princess most from the three Bāhlīkas and them from the Puṣpamitras and Paṭumitras, who governed Mekalā, a country on the Narbada (see Bk. II. Ch. III. n. 18). What the Bāhlīkas or princes of Balkh, had to do in this part of India is doubtful. The Durmitra of the Bhāgavata has been conjectured by Tod (Trans. R. As. Soc. I. 325) to be intended for the Bactrian prince Demetrius : but it is not clear that even the Bhāgavata considers this prince as one of the Bāhlīkas and the name occurs nowhere else.

68. For the situation of Kośalā, see Bk.II. Ch. III. n. 79. The three copies of the Vāyu read Komalā and call the kings, the Meghas, more strong than sapient : कोमलायां तु राजानो भविष्यन्ति महाबलाः मेघा इति समाख्याता बुद्धिमन्तो न वै च तु। The Bhāgavata agrees with our text. The Vāyu says of the Naiṣadhas or kings of Niṣadha, that they were all of the race of Nala; नलवंश प्रसृताः। The Bhāgavata adds two other races, seven Andhras (see note 63) and kings of Vaidūra, with the remark that these were all contemporaries, being, as the commentator observes, petty or provincial rulers : खण्डलमण्डलेषुभूपालाः।

69. The Vāyu has Viśvasphāṇi and Viśvasphīṇi : the Bhāgavata, Viśvasphūrtti or in some Mss. Viśvaphūrji. The castes he establishes or places in authority, to the exclusion of the Kṣatriyas, are called in all the copies of our text Kaivarttas, Paṭus, Pulindas and Brāhmaṇas. The Vāyu (three MSS.) has Kaivarttas, Pañcakas, Pulindas and Brāhmaṇas : कैवर्त्तान् पंचकांश्चैव पुलिन्दान्ब्राह्मणान्तथा। The Bhāgavata has, Pulindas, Yadus and Mādrakas. The Vāyu describes Viśvasphāṇi as a great warrior and apparently as a eunuch : विश्वस्फाणि महासत्वो युद्धे विष्णुसमो बली। विश्वस्फाणिर्नरपति क्लीवा विकृतिरूप्यते॥ He worshipped the gods and manes and dying on the banks of the Ganges went to the heaven of Indra : जाह्नवीतीरमासाद्य शरीर त्यक्ष्यते बली संन्यस्य शरीरं तं शक्रलोकं गमिष्यति।

70. Such appears to be the purport of our text : नव नागाः पंद्यावत्यां कान्तिपुर्य्यां मथुरायामनु। गंगाप्रयागं मागधागुप्ताश्च भोक्ष्यन्ति॥ The nine Nāgas might be thought to mean the same as the descendants of Śeṣanāga, but the Vāyu has another series here, analogous to that of the text : 'The nine Nāka kings will possess the city Campāvatī and the seven Nāgas (?) the pleasant city Mathurā. Princes of the Gupta race will posses all these countries, the banks of the Ganges to Prayāga and Sāketa and Magadha :' नव नाकास्तुभोक्ष्यन्ति पुरी चम्पावतीं नृपाः। मथुरां च पुरीं रम्यां नागा भोक्ष्यन्ति सप्त वै। अनुगंगाप्रयागंच साकेतं मगधांस्तथा। एतान् जनपदान् सर्व्वान् भोक्ष्यन्ते गुप्तवंशजाः॥ This account is the most explicit and probably most accurate, of all. The Nākas were Rājās of Bhāgalpur; the Nāgas, of Mathurā; and the intermediate countries along the Ganges were governed by the Guptas or Rājās of the Vaiśya caste. The Bhāgavata seems to have taken great liberties with the account, as it makes Viśvasphūrtti king over Anugaṅgā, the course of the Ganges from Haridvāra, according to the commentator, to Prayāga, residing at Padmavatī : वीर्य्यवान् क्षत्रमुत्साय्य पद्मवत्यां स वै पुरि। अनुगंगामाप्रयागं गुप्तां भोक्ष्यन्ति मेदिनीं॥ omitting the Nāgas altogether and converting 'gupta' into an epithet of 'medinī,' the preserved or protected earth. Wilford considers the Nāgas, Nākas and Guptas to be all the same : he says, 'Then came a dynasty of nine kings, called the nine Nācas or Nāgas; these were an obscure tribe, called for that reason Guptavaṅśas, who ruled in Padmāvati'. That city he calles Patna, but in the Mālati and Madhava Padmāvatī lies amongst the Vindhya hills Kāntipurī he makes Kotwal, near Gwalior. The reading of the Vāyu, Campāvatī, however, obviates the necessity of all vague conjecture. According to Wilford there is a powerful tribe still called Nākas between the Yamunā and the Betvā. Of the existence and power of the Guptas, however, we have recently had ample proofs from inscriptions and coins, as in the Candragupta and Samudragupta of the Allatabad column; Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, March and June, 1834; and Kumāragupta, Candragupta, Samudragupta, Śaśigupta, on the Archer coins, found at Kanauj and elsewhere; As. Res. XVII. pl. 1. fig. 5, 7, 13, 19; and Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, Nov. 1835, pl. 38 and 39; and in other numbers of the same Journal : in all which, the character in which the legends are written is of a period prior to the use of the modern Devanāgarī and was current in all probability about the fifth century of our era, as conjectured by Prinsep : see his table of the modifications of the Sanskrit alphabet from 543 B.C. to 1200 A.D. Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, March, 1838.

71. The Vāyu also mentions the descendants of Devarakṣita or Daivarakṣitas as kings of the Kośalas, Tāmralipta and the sea coast; so far conforming with our text as to include the western parts of Bengal, Tamluk, Midnapur and Orissa. One copy reads Andhra, perhaps for Oḍra, Orissa; and one has Campā for the capital, which is probably an error, although the two other MSS., being still more faulty, do not offer the means of correction.

72. The Vāyu has the same. The countries are parts of Orissa and Berar.

73. The Vāyu has sons of Maṇidhaṇya for the ruling dynasty, but names the countries those of the Naiṣadhas, Yudakas, Śaiśikas and Kālatoyas. The first name applies to a tract of country near the Vindhya mountains, but the last to a country in the north. The west or south-west, however, is probably intended in this place.

74. The Stri Rājya is usually placed in Bhote. It may perhaps here designate Malabar, where polyandry equally prevails. Mūṣika or the country of thieves, was the pirate coast of the Konkan. The Vāyu reads Bhokṣyaka or Bhokhyaka for Mūṣika : स्तीराज्यं भोक्ष्यकांश्चैव भोक्ष्यन्ति कनकाद्वयाः। The Bhāgavata omits all these specifications subsequent to the notice of Viśvasphūrtti.

75. From this we might infer that the Viṣṇu Purāṇa was compiled when the Mohammedans were making their first encroachments on the west. They seem to have invaded and to have settled in Sindh early in the eighth century, although Indian princes continued on the Indus for a subsequent period. Scriptor. Arab. De rebus Indicis. Gildemeister, p.6. They were engaged in hostilities in 698 or 700 with prince of Kabul, in whose name, however disguised by its Mohammedan representations of Ratil, Ratbal or Ratibal, it is not difficult to recognise the genuine Hindu appellation of Ratanpāl or Ratnapāl. Their progress in this direction has not been traced; but at the period of their invasion of sindh they advanced to Multan and probably established themselves there and at Lahore within a century. Kashmir they did not occupy till a much later date and the Rāja Taraṅgini takes no notice of any attacks upon it; but the Chinese have recorded an application from the king of Kashmir, Chin-tho-lo-pi-li, evidently the Candrāpiḍa of the Sanskrit, for aid against the Arabs, about A.D. 713. Gildemeister, p. 13. Although, therefore, not actually settled at the Punjab so early as the beginning, they had commenced their incursions and had no doubt made good their footing by the end of the eighth or commencement of the ninth century. This age of the Purāṇa is compatible with reference to the contemporary race of Gupta kings, from the fourth or fifth to the seventh or eighth century; or if we are disposed to go farther back, we may apply the passage to the Greek and Indo-Scythian princes. It seems more likely to be the former period; but in all such passages in this or other Purāṇas there is the risk that verses inspired by the presence of Mohammedan rulers may have been interpolated into the original text. Had the Mohammedans of Hindustan, however, been intended by the latter, the indications would have been more distinct and the localities assigned to them more central. Even the Bhāgavata, the date of which we have good reason for conjecturing to be the middle of the twelfth century and which influenced the form assumed about that time by the worship of Viṣṇu, cannot be thought or refer to the Mohammedan conquerors of upper India. It is there stated, that 'rulers fallen from their castes or Śūdras, will be the princes of Saurāṣṭra, Avanti, Abhīra, Śūra, Arbuda and Mālava; and barbarians, Śūdras and other outcastes, not enlightened by the Vedas, will possess Kāshmir, Kauntī and the banks of the Candrabhāgā and Indus :' सौराष्ट्रावन्त्यभीराश्चशूरा अर्ब्बुदमालवाः। व्रात्या द्विजा भविष्यन्ति शूद्रप्रायाः जनाधिपाः। सिन्धोस्तटं चन्द्रभागां कौन्तीं काप्मीरमण्डलं। भोक्ष्यन्ति शूद्रा व्रात्याद्या म्लेच्छा अब्रह्मवर्च्चस॥ Now it was not until the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries that the Mohammedans established themselves in Gujarat and Malva and the Bhāgavata was unquestionably well known in various parts of India long before that time. (Account of Hindus Sects. As. Res. Vol. XVI). It cannot therefore allude to Mohammedans. By specifying the princes as seceders from the Vedas, there is no doubt that the barbarians and outcastes intended are so only in a religious sense; and we know from indisputable authorities that the western countries, Gujarat, Abu, Mālavā, were the chief seats, first of the Buddhists and then of the Jainas, from a period commencing perhaps before the Christian era and scarcely terminating with the Mohammedan conquest. Inscriptions from Abu, As. Res. Vol. XVI.

76. The commentator, having no doubt the existing state of things in view, interprets the passage somewhat differently : the original is, तैश्चविमिश्रा जनपदास्तच्छीलवर्त्तिनो राजाश्रयशुष्मिणो म्लैच्छाश्चार्याश्चविपर्य्ययेण वर्त्तमानाः प्रजाः क्षपयिष्यन्ति। The comment explains शुष्मिणाः 'strong' (बलिनः), and adds, 'the Mlecchas will be in the centre and the Āryyas at the end:' म्लेच्छा मध्ये आर्य्याश्चान्ते इत्येतदूपेण वर्त्तमानाः। meaning, if any thing, that the unbelievers are in the heart of the country and the Hindus on the borders : a description, however, never correct, except as applicable to the governments; and in that case inconsistent with the text, which had previously represented the bordering countries in the hands of outcastes and heretics. All that the text intends, is to represent infidels and foreigners high in power and the Brāhmaṇas depressed. It is not unlikely that the reading is erroneous, notwithstanding the copies concur and that the passage should be here the same as that of the Vāyu; तैर्विमिश्रा जनपदा म्लेच्छाचाराश्चसर्व्वशः विपर्ययेण वर्त्तन्ते नाशयिष्यन्ति वै प्रजाः। 'Intermixed with them, the nations, adopting everywhere barbaric institutions, exist in a state of disorder and the subjects shall be destroyed.' The expression Mlecchācārāśca being used instead of Mlecchāscāryāsca. A passage similar to that of the text, noticing the intermixture of Hindus and Barbarians, occurs in a different place (see Bk.II. Ch. III. n. 4) and designates the conditions of India in all ages : at no period has the whole of the population followed Brahmanical Hinduism.

77. That is, there will be no Tīrthas, places held sacred and objects of pilgrimage; no particular spot of earth will have any especial sanctity.

78. Gifts will be made from the impulse of ordinary feeling, not in connection with religious rites and as an act of devotion; and ablution will be performed for pleasure or comfort, not religiously with prescribed ceremonies and prayers.

79. The expression Sadveśadhārian (सद्वेषधारिन्) is explained to mean either one who wears fine clothes or who assumes the exterior garb of sanctity. Either interpretation is equally allowable.

80. The Bhāgavata agrees with the text in these particulars. The chief star of Tiṣya is in the constellation Cancer.

81. All the copies concur in this reading; यावत्परीक्षितो जन्म यावन्नन्दाभिषेचनं। एतद्वर्षसहस्रं तु ज्ञेयं पंचदशोत्तरं॥ Three copies of the Vāyu assign to the same interval 1050 years : पंचाशदुत्तरं। and of the Matsya five copies have the same, पंचाशदुत्तरं। or 1050 years; while one copy has 1500 years; पंचशतोत्तरं। The Bhāgavata has 1115 years; एतद्वर्षसहस्रं तु शतं पंचदशोत्तरं। which the commentator explains, a thousand years and a hundred with fifteen over;' वर्षसहस्रं पंचदशोत्तरं शतं च। He notices nevertheless, although he doesn't attempt to account for the discrepancy, that the total period from Parīkṣit to Nanda was actually, according to the duration of the different intermediate dynasties, as enumerated by all the authorities, fifteen centuries; viz. Magadha kings . . . 1000 years, Pradyota etc . . .138 years. Śiśunāga. . . 362. Total 1500 years. The shorter period is best proportioned to the number of kings; for reckoning from Sahadeva, who was contemporary with Parīkṣit and taking the number of the Vārhadrathas from the Matsya, we have thirty-two of them, five of the Pradyota race and ten Śaiśuṅāgas or in all forty-seven; which, as the divisor of 1050, gives rather more twenty-two years to a reign. The Vāyu an the Matsya further specify the interval from Nanda to Pulomat, that last of the Āndhra kings, as being 836 years; a total that does not agree exactly with the items previously specified : 9 Nandas. . .100 years, 10 Mauryas. . .137, 10 Śuṅgas. . .112, 4 Kaṇvas. . .45. 29 Andhras. . .460. Total 62 kings, 854 years. In either case the average duration of reign is not improbable, as the highest number gives less than fourteen years to each prince. It is important to remember that the reign of Parīkṣit is, according to Hindu chronology, coeval with the commencement of the Kali age; and even therefore taking the longest Paurāṇik interval we have but sixteen centuries between Candragupta–or considering him as the same with Sandrocoptos, nineteen centuries B.C.–for the beginning of the Kali age. According to the chronology of our text, however, it would be but B.C. 1415; to that of the Vāyu and Matsya, B.C. 1450; and to that of the Bhāgavata, 1515. According to Wilford's computations (As. Res. Vol. IX. Chron. Table, p. 116) the conclusion of the great war took place B.C. 1370; Buchanan conjectures it to have occurred in the thirteenth century B.C. Vyāsa was the putative father of Pāṇḍu and Dhṛtarāṣṭra and consequently was contemporary with the heroes of the great war. Colebrooke infers from astronomical date that arrangement of the Vedas attributed to Vyāsa took place in the fourteenth century B.C. Bentley brings the date of Yudhiṣṭhira, the chief of the Pāṇḍavas, to 575 B.C. (Historical View of Hindu Astronomy, p. 67); but the weight of authority is in favour of the thirteenth or fourteenth century B.C. for the war of the Mahābhārata and the reputed commencement of the Kali age.

82. A similar explanation is given in the Bhāgavata, Vāyu and Matsya Purāṇas; and like accounts from astronomical writers are cited by Colebrooke, As. Res. Vol. IX. P. 358. The commentator on the Bhāgavata thus explains the notion : "The two stars (Pulaha and Kratu) must rise or be visible before the rest and whichever asterism is in a line south from the middle of those stars, is that with which the seven stars are united; and so they continue for one hundred years." Wilford has also given a like explanation of the revolution of the Ṛṣis; As. Res. Vol. IX. P. 83. According to Bentley the notion originated in a contrivance of the astronomers to show the quantity of the precession of the equinoxes. "This was by assuming an imaginary line or great circle passing through the poles of the ecliptic and the beginning of the fixed Maghā, which circle was supposed to cut some of the stars in the Great Bear. The seven stars in the Great Bea the circle so assumed was called the line of the Ṛṣis and being fixed to the beginning of the lunar asterism Maghā, the precession would be solved by stating the degree etc., of any moveable lunar mansion cut by that fixed line or circle as an index. Historical View of Hindu Astronomy, p.65.

83. The Bhāgavata has the same; and this agrees with the period assigned for the interval between Parīkṣit and Nanda of 1050 years; as, including Maghā, we have ten asterisms to Purvāśāḍhā or 1000 years. The Vāyu and Matsya are so very inaccurate in all the copies consulted, that it is not safe to affirm what they mean to describe apparently they state that at the end of the Andhra dynasty the Ṛṣis will be in Kṛttikā, which furnishes other ten asterisms; the whole being nearly in accordance with the chronology of the text, as the total interval from Parīkṣit to the last of the Andhras is 1050+836=1886 and the entire century of each asterism at the beginning and end of the series need not be taken into account The copies of the Matsya read, सप्तर्षयस्तथा तेस्युः प्रदीप्ताग्नि समं। 'The seven Ṛṣis are on a line with the brilliant Agni;' that is, with Kṛttikā, of which Agni is the presiding deity . The Vāyu intends in all probability the same phrase, but the three copies have, प्रतीपे राज्ञि। a very unintelligible clause. Again, it seems as if they intended to designate the end of the Andhra race as the period of a complete revolution or 2700 years; for the Vāyu has, सप्तविंशैः शतै भविव्या अन्ध्राणान्तेऽन्वया पुनः। 'The races at the end of the Andhras will be after 2700 years:' the Matsya has, सप्तविंशति भाव्येन अन्ध्राणान्तेन्थकात् (?) पुनः। and at the close of the passage, after specifying as usual that 'the seven Ṛṣis were in Maghā in the time of Parīkṣit.' सप्तर्षयो मधायुक्ताः कालै परीक्षितः समे। the Vāyu adds, अन्ध्रान्ते स चतुर्विंशे भविष्यन्ति स ते मता। a passage which, though repeated in the MSS., is obviously most inaccurate; although it might perhaps be understood to intimate that the Ṛṣis will be in the twenty-fourth asterism after the Andhra race : but that would give only 1400 years from Parīkṣit to Puloma; whilst if the twenty-fourth from Maghā was intended, it would give 2400 years : both periods being incompatible with previous specifications. The Matsya has a different reading of the second line, but one not much more satisfactory; ब्राह्मणास्तुचतुर्विंशे भविष्यन्ति शतंसमाः। 'A hundred years of Brahmā will be in the twenty-fourth (asterism?).' In neither of these authorities, however, is it proposed by the last-cited passages to illustrate the chronology of princes or dynasties: the specification of the period, whatever it may be, is that of the era at which the evil influence of the Kali age is to become most active and irresistible.

84. The Bhāgavata has the same. Devāpi, as the commentator observes, being the restorer of the lunar and Maru of the solar race.

85. To be the cause of Saṁkalpa. 'conviction,' 'belief' and Vikalpa, 'doubt,' 'disbelief.' The Bhāgavata indulges in a similar strain and often in the same words. The whole recalls the words of the Roman satirist; I, demens et saevas curre per Alpes, Ut pueris placeas, et declamatio fias.

Maitreya said[1]–You have related to me a full account of all the different dynasties of kings and of their successive transactions. I wish now to hear a more particular description, holy Ṛṣi, of the portion of Viṣnu[2] that came down upon earth and was born in the family of Yadu. Tell me also what actions he performed in his descent, as a part of a part of the supreme, upon the earth.[3]

Vasudeva formerly married the daughter of Devaka, the illustrious Devakī, a maiden of celestial beauty. After their nuptials, Kaṁsa, the increaser of the race of Bhoja, drove their car as their charioteer. As they were going along, a voice in the sky, sounding aloud and deep as thunder, addressed Kaṁsa and said, "Fool that you are, the eighth child of the damsel whom you are driving in the car shall take away your life[4]!" On hearing this, Kaṁsa drew his sword and was about to put Devakī to death; but Vasudeva interposed, saying, "Kill not Devakī, great warrior; spare her life and I will deliver to you every child that she may bring forth." Appeased by which promise and relying on the character of Vasudeva, Kaṁsa desisted from the attempt.

"Agni," said Earth, "is the progenitor of gold; Sūrya, of rays of light :[5] the parent and guide of me and of all spheres is the supreme Nārāyaṇa, who is Brahmā, the lord of the lord of patriarchs; the eldest of the eldest born; one with minutes and hours; one with time; having form, though indiscrete. This assemblage of yourselves, O gods, is but a part of him. The sun, the winds the saints, the Rudras. the Vasus, the Aśvins, fire, the patriarch creators of the universe, of whom Atri is the first, all are but forms of the mighty and inscrutable Viṣṇu. The Yakṣas, Rākṣasas, Daityas, spirits of evil, serpents and children of Danu, the singers and nymphs of heaven, are forms of the great spirit, Viṣṇu. The heavens painted with planets, constellations and stars; fire, water, wind and myself and every perceptible thing; the whole universe itself–consists of Viṣṇu. The multifarious forms of that manifold being encounter and succeed one another, night and day, like the waves of the sea. At this present season many demons, of whom Kālanemi is the chief, have over-run and continually harass, the region of mortals. The great Asura Kālanemi,[6] that was killed by the powerful Viṣṇu, has revived in Kaṁsa, the son of Ugrasena and many other mighty demons, more than I can enumerate, as Ariṣṭa, Dhenuka, Keśin, Pralamba, Naraka, Sunda and the fierce Bāṇa, the son of Bali,[7] are born in the palaces of kings. Countless hosts of proud and powerful spirits, chiefs of the demon race, assuming celestial forms, now walk the earth; and, unable to support myself beneath the incumbent load, I come to you for succour. Illustrious deities, do you so act that I may be relieved from my burden, lest helpless I sink into the nethermost abyss."

"Celestials," said Brahmā, "all that Earth has said is undoubtedly true. I, Mahādeva and you all, are but Nārāyaṇa; but the impersonations of his power are forever mutually fluctuating and excess or diminution is indicated by the predominance of the strong and the depression of the weak. Come therefore, let us repair to the northern coast of the milky sea and having glorified Hari, report to him what we have heard. He, who is the spirit of all and of whom the universe consists, constantly, for the sake of Earth, descends in a small portion of his essence to establish righteousness below."

"O you," said Brahmā, "who are distinct from holy writ[8]; whose double nature is twofold wisdom[9], superior and inferior and who are the essential end of both; who, alike devoid and possessed of form, are the twofold Brahma[10]; smallest of the least and largest of the large; all and knowing all things; that spirit which is language; that spirit which is supreme; that which is Brahma and of which Brahma is composed! You are the Ṛk, the Yajuṣ, the Sāman and the Atharvan Vedas. You are accentuation, ritual, signification, metre and astronomy; history, tradition, grammar, theology, logic and law : you who are inscrutable. You are the doctrine that investigates the distinctions between soul and life and body and matter endowed with qualities[11]; and that doctrine is nothing else but your nature inherent in and presiding over it[12]. You are imperceptible, indescribable, inconceivable; without name or colour or hands or feet; pure, eternal and infinite. You hear without ears and see without eyes. You are one and multiform. You move without feet; you seize without hands. You know all, but are not by all to be known[13]. He who beholds you as the most subtle of atoms, not substantially existent, puts an end to ignorance; and final emancipation is the reward of that wise man whose understanding cherishes nothing other than you in the form of supreme delight[14]. You are the common centre of all[15], the protector of the world and all beings exist in you : all that has been or will be, you are. You are the atom of atoms; you are spirit; you only are distinct from primeval nature[16]. You, as the lord of fire in four manifestations[17], give light and fertility to Earth. You are the eye of all and wearer of many shapes and unobstructedly traverses the three regions of the universe. As fire, though one, is variously kindled and, though unchangeable in its essence, is modified in many ways, so you, lord, who are one omnipresent form, take upon you all modifications that exist. You are one supreme; you are that supreme and eternal state which the wise behold with the eye of knowledge. There is nothing else but you. O lord; nothing; else has been or will be. You are both discrete and indiscreet, universal and individual, omniscient, all seeing, omnipotent, possessed of all wisdom and strength and power. You are liable neither to diminution nor increase; you are independence and without beginning; you are the subjugator of all. You are unaffected by weariness, sloth, fear, anger or desire. You are free from soil, supreme, merciful,[18] uniform, undecaying, lord over all, the stay of all, the fountain of light, imperishable. To you, uninvested by material envelopes,[19] unexposed to sensible imaginings, aggregate of elemental substance,[20] spirit supreme, be adoration. You assume a shape, O pervader of the universe, not as the consequence of virtue or vice, nor from any mixture of the two, but for the sole object of maintaining piety in the world.[21]"

When Brahmā had ended, the supreme lord plucked off two hairs, one white and one black and said to the gods, "These my hairs shall descend upon earth and shall relieve her of the burden of her distress.[23] Let all the gods also, in their own portions, go down to earth and wage war with the haughty Asuras, who are there incorporate and who shall every one of them be destroyed. Doubt not of this : they shall perish before the withering glance of mine eyes. This my (black) hair shall be impersonated in the eighth conception of the wife of Vasudeva, Devakī, who is like a goddess; and shall slay Kaṁsa, who is the demon Kālanemi." Thus having spoken, Hari disappeared; and the gods bowing to him, though invisible, returned to the summit of mount Meru, from whence they descended upon earth.

The Muni Nārada informed Kaṁsa that the supporter of the earth, Viṣṇu, would be the eighth child of Devakī; and his wrath being excited by this report, he placed both Vasudeva and Devakī in confinement. Agreeably to his promise, the former delivered to Kaṁsa each infant as soon as it was born. It is said that these, to the number of six, were the children of the demon Hiraṇyakaśipu, who were introduced into the womb of Devakī, at the command of Viṣṇu, during the hours of Devakī's repose, by the goddess Yoganidrā,[24] the great illusory energy of Viṣṇu, by whom, as utter ignorance, the whole world is beguiled.

You are wealth, progeny, fame, patience, heaven and earth, fortitude, modesty, nutrition, dawn and every other female (form or property). They who address you morning and afternoon with reverence and praise and call you Āryā, Durgā, Vedagarbhā, Ambikā, Bhadrā, Bhadrakālī, Kṣemī or Kṣe-mankarī, shall receive from my bounty whatever they desire. Propitiated with offerings of wine and flesh and various viands, you shall bestow upon mankind all their prayers. Through my favour all men shall ever have faith in you. Assured of this, go, goddess and execute my commands."

NOTES

1. The whole of this book is dedicated to the biography of Kṛṣṇa. Many of the Purāṇas omit this subject altogether or only allude to it occasionally. In others it is equally prominent. The Brahma Purāṇa gives the story exactly in the same words as our text: which has the best right to them may be questioned; but, as it is usually met with, the Brahma Purāṇa is a very heterogeneous compilation. The Hari Vaṁśa has a narrative more detailed than that of the text, with additions and embellishments of its own. The Brahma Vaivartta throughout celebrates the acts of Kṛṣṇa; and one portion of it. the Kṛṣṇa Janma Khaṇḍa, especially describes his boyhood and youth. The incidents are the same in general as those in the text, but they are lost amidst interminable descriptions of Kṛṣṇa's sports with the Gopīs and with his mistress Rādhā, a person not noticed elsewhere; the whole is in a style indicative of a modern origin. The Agni Purāṇa and Padma Purāṇa (Uttara Khaṇḍa) have accounts of Kṛṣṇa, but they are mere summaries, compiled evidently from other works. The principal authority for the adventures of Kṛṣṇa is the Bhāgavata, the tenth book of which is exclusively devoted to him. It is this work which has, no doubt, mainly extended the worship of Kṛṣṇa, as its popularity is evinced by its having been translated into all the spoken languages of India professing to have a literature. The Prem-sagar. its Hindi version, is well known; but there are also translations in Mahratta, Telugu, Tamil. It does not seem likely, however, that the Viṣṇu Purāṇa has copied the Bhāgavata; for although its greater conciseness may sometimes look like abridgement, yet the descriptions are generally of a more simple and antiquated character. Here, as usual, the Mahābhārata is no doubt the earliest extant authority; but it is not the earliest, for whilst it omits to narrate most of his personal adventures unconnected with his alliance with the Pāṇḍavas, it often alludes to them and names repeatedly his capital, his wives and his progeny. It also devotes a section, the Mauśala Parva, to the destruction of the Yādavas. The story of Kṛṣṇa the prince and hero must have been complete when the Mahābhārata was compiled. It is doubtful, however, if Kṛṣṇa the boy and his adventures at Vṛndāvan, were not subsequent inventions. There are no allusions to them in the poem, of an unsuspicious nature. The only ones that I have met with are contained in a speech by Śiśupāla. Sabhā Parva, vol. 1. p. 360, in which he reviles Kṛṣṇa; but they may easily have been interpolated. There may be others scattered through the poem, but I have not observed them.

2. The notices of Kṛṣṇa's origin and character in various passages of the Mahābhārata are by no means consistent and indicate different dates at least. In an address to him by Arjuna, Vana Parva, vol. 1. p. 426, he is said to have passed thousands of years in various holy places, engaged in arduous penances. He is frequently identified with the Ṛṣi Nārāyaṇa or he and Arjuna are said to be Nara and Nārāyaṇa : त्व चवाहं च कौन्तेय नरनारायणौ स्मृतौ। In the Dāna-dharma he is represented as a worshipper of Śiva and propitiating him and his wife Umā and receiving as boons from them wives and children. As a warrior and prince he is always on the scene; but he is repeatedly called an Aṁśa or portion of Viṣṇu; whilst in a great number of places he is identified with Viṣṇu or Nārāyaṇa and is consequently 'all things.' This latter is his character, of course, amongst the Vaiṣṇavas, agreeably to the text of the Bhāgavata : कृष्णास्तु भगवान् स्वयं। 'Kṛṣṇa is the lord (Viṣṇu) himself.'

3. This is a still farther diminution of Kṛṣṇa's dignity; he is not even a part, but 'a part of a part,' Aṁśāṁśāvatāra (अंशाशांवतारः) but this, the commentator maintains, is to be understood only of his from or condition as man, not of his power, as it suffered no diminution, either in its primary or secondary state, as light by suffusion suffers no decrease; and a verse of the Veda is cited to this effect : 'Though that which is full be taken from what is full, yet the remainder is undiminished ;' पूर्णस्यपूर्णमादाय पूर्णमेवावशिष्यते। 'Kṛṣṇa is nevertheless the very supreme Brahma, though it be a mystery how the supreme should assume the form of a man; परं ब्रह्म नराकृति परं गूढं परं ब्रह्म मनुष्यलिङ्गं कृष्णास्तु भगवानस्वयम्। So the Bhāgavata in one passage predicts that the Para-puruṣa, Puruṣottama or Viṣṇu, will be born visibly in the dwelling of Vasudeva; वसुदेवगृहे साक्षाद्भगवान् पुरुषः परः जनिष्यते।

4. The Bhāgavata tells the circumstance as in the text. The Hari Vaṁśa makes Nārada apprise Kaṁsa of his danger. Nārada's interposition is not mentioned until afterwards by our authority. Devakī is the cousin of Kaṁsa : see Bk. iv. Ch. xv.

5. Agni or fire, refines gold, burns away the dross, according to the commentator. The sun is the lord of the rays of light; or, as the cause of rain and vegetation, the lord of cattle. The phrase is, गवां सूर्य्यः परो गुरुः।

6. According to the Vāyu, Kālanemi or Kayabadha was a son of Virocana, the grandson of Hiraṇyakaśipu : his death is described in the Hari Vaṁśa.

7. These appear subsequently in the narration and are destroyed by Kṛṣṇa.

8. Anāmnāya (अनाम्नाय); not the immediate object of the Vedas, which is devotion, not abstraction; ritual or worship, not knowledge.

9. The two kinds of knowledge (द्वेविद्ये) are termed Parā (परा) 'supreme,' and Aparā (अपरा), 'other' or 'subordinate , the first is knowledge of Para Brahma, of spirit abstractedly considered, perfect knowledge derived from abstraction; the second is knowledge of Śabda Brahma, of spirit as described and taught in the Vedas or their supplementary branches. The identity of the supreme with both descriptions of holy knowledge pervades the whole of the address.

10. Para Brahma and Śabda Brahma : see the preceding note.

11. The doctrine alluded to may be either intended generally or in the several instances, the discussion of the spiritual soul and living soul, of body subtle and sensible and of matter endowed with qualities, reference may be purposed to the Vedānta, Yoga and Sāṁkhya systems.

12. That is, as the Śabda Brahma, the supreme is identical with philosophical doctrines, being the object, the instigator and the result.

13. This is taken from the Vedas, the original of which is quoted and translated by Jones : see his Works. XIII. 368. The passage is thus cited by the commentator on our text : अपाणिपादो जवनो गृहीता पश्यत्यचक्षुः स शृणोत्यकर्णः स वेत्ति वेद्य न च तस्य वेत्ता तमाहुरग्र्यं पुरुषं महान्तं। 'Without hand or foot he runs, he grasps; without eyes he sees; and without ears he hears : he know all that may be known and no one know him. Him they call the first great spirit.'

14. Varenya rūpa, explained by Paramānanda mūrtti; he whose form or impersonation is Supreme felicity.

15. Literally 'navel of all ;' त्वं विश्वनाभिः। The passage is also read, त्वं विश्वमादिः। 'Though are all and the first ;' the cause or creator.

16. Or the passage is understood, 'Though are one subsequently to Prakṛti;' त्वमेकः प्रकृतेः परस्तात्। that is, you are Brahmā, the active will of the supreme, creating forms from rudimental matter.

17. As the three fires enjoined by the Vedas and the fire metaphorically of devotion; or lightnings, solar heat, fire generated artificially and the fire of digestion or animal fire; or Viṣṇu in that character bestows beauty, vigour, power and wealth.

18. Prīta : one copy has Śānta, 'calm,' 'undisturbed.'

19. Beyond the separate layers or envelopes of elementary substances (see p. 18); or, according to the Vedānta notions, uninvested by those grosser sheaths or coverings, derived from food and the like, by which subtle body is enclosed.

20. Mahāvibhūti saṁsthāna (महाविभूतिसंस्थान). Vibhūti is explained by Prapañca, sensible material or elementary substance, constituting body.

21. The passage is somewhat obscurely expressed and is differently interpreted; it is, नाकारणात्कारणाद्वा कारणाकारणात्रच। 'Not from no cause, nor from cause, nor from'' cause and no cause.' The term 'no cause' may, the commentator says designate fixed prescribed duties, the Nityakarma; 'cause' may signify occasional sacrifices, the Kāmya-karma : neither of these can form any neccssity for Viṣṇu's descent, as they might of a mere mortal's being born on the earth : or Kāraṇa is explained to mean 'obtaining pleasure,' from Ka (क) and Āraṇa (आरणं), 'obtaining: ' obtaining happiness or the cause of it, piety, virtue (धर्म्मः); and with the negative, Akāraṇa (अकारणं), the reverse, pain, the consequence of wickedness (अधर्म्मः). The purport is clear enough; is merely meant to state that Viṣṇu is not subject to the necessity which is the cause of human birth.

22. The term Pradhāna, which is repeated in this passage, is explained in the second place to mean Pumān, 'soul' or 'spirit :' प्रधानबुद्धीन्द्रियवत् प्रधानमूलापरात्मन्।

23. The same account of the origin of Kṛṣṇa is given in the Mahābhārata, Ādi Parva vol. I. p. 266. The white hair is impersonated as Balarāma; the black, as Kṛṣṇa. The commentator on our text maintains that this is not to be literally understood : 'Viṣṇu did not intend that the two hairs should become incarnate, but he meant to signify, that, should he send them, they would be more than sufficient to destroy Kaṁsa and his demons : or the birth of Rāma and Kṛṣṇa was a double illusion, typified by the two hairs.' This scems to be a refinement upon an older and somewhat undignified account of the origin of Kṛṣṇa and his brother. The commentator on the Mahābhārata argues that they are to be understood merely as the media by which Devakī and Rohiṇī conceived.

24. Yoganidrā (योगनिद्रा) is the sleep of devotion or abstraction, the active principle of illusion, personified and also termed Māyā and Mahāmāyā, also Avidyā or ignorance. In the Durgā Māhātmya of the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa she appears as Devī or Durgā, the Śakti or bride of Śiva; but in our text as Vaiṣṇavī or the Śakti of Viṣṇu.

25. Allusion is here made to the exploits of Durgā, as celebrated especially in the Durgā Māhātmya : and it must be posterior to the date of that or same similar composition. The passage may be an interpolation, as the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa in general has the appearance of being a more recent compilation than the Viṣṇu.

26. This refers to the Pīṭha sthānas, 'fifty-one places', where, according to the Tantras, the limbs of Śatī fell, when scattered by her husband Śiva, as he bore her dead body about and tore it to pieces, after she had put an end to her existence at Dakṣa's sacrifice. This part of the legend scems to be an addition to the original fable made by the Tantras, as it is not in the Purāṇas (see the story of Dakṣa's sacrifice). It bears some analogy to the Egyptian fable of Isis and Osiris. At the Pīṭha sthānas, however, of Jvālāmukhī, Vindhyavāsinī, Kālīghāṭ and others, temples are erected to the different forms of Devī or Śatī, not to the phallic emblem of Mahādeva, which, if present, is there as an accessory and embellishment, not as a principal and the chief object of worship is a figure of the goddess; a circumstance in which there is an essential difference between the temples of Durgā and shrines of Osiris.

The nurse of the universe, Jagaddhātrī, thus enjoined by the god of gods, conveyed the six several embryos into the womb of Devakī[1] and transferred the seventh after a season to that of Rohiṇī; after which, Hari, for the benefit of the three regions, became incarnate as the conception of the former princess and Yoganidrā as that of Yaśodā, exactly as the supreme Viṣṇu had commanded. When the portion of Viṣṇu had become incorporate upon earth, the planetary bodies moved in brilliant order in the heavens and the seasons were regular and genial. No person could bear to gaze upon Devakī, from the light that invested her; and those who contemplated her radiance felt their minds disturbed. The gods, invisible to mortals, celebrated her praises continually from the time that Viṣṇu was contained in her person.

You are light, whence day is begotten : you are humility, the mother of true wisdom : you are kingly policy, the parent of order : you are modesty, the progenitrix of affection: you are desire, of whom love is born : you are contentment, whence resignation is derived: you are intelligence, the mother of knowledge: you are patience, the parent of fortitude-: you are the heavens and your children are the stars: and from you does all that exists proceed. Such, goddess and thousands more, are your mighty faculties; and now innumerable are the contents of your womb, O mother of the universe. The whole earth, decorated with oceans, rivers, continents, cities, villages, hamlets and towns; all the fires, waters and winds; the stars, asterisms and planets; the sky, crowded with the variegated chariots of the gods and ether, that provides space for all substance; the several spheres of earth, sky and heaven; of saints, sages, ascetics and of Brahmā; the whole egg of Brahmā, with all its population of gods, demons, spirits, snake-gods, fiends, ghosts and imps, men and animals and whatever creatures have life,

NOTES

1. It is mentioned in the preceding chapter that they were all put to death, in which the Hari Vaṁśa concurs. The Bhāgavata makes Kaṁsa spare them and restore them to their parents, as he had nothing to apprehend from their existence.

Thus eulogiscd by the gods, Devakī bore in her womb the lotus-eyed deity, the protector of the world. The sun of Acyuta rose in the dawn of Devakī to cause the lotus petal of the universe to expand. On the day of his birth the quarters of the horizon were irradiate with joy, as it moonlight was diffused over the whole earth. The virtuous experienced new delight, the strong winds were hushed and the rivers gilded tranquilly, when Janārddana was about to be born. The seas with their own melodious murmurings made the music, while the spirits and the nymphs of heaven danced and sang : the gods, walking thc sky, showered down flowers upon the earth and the holy fires glowed with a mild and gentle flame. At midnight, when the supporter of all was about to be born, the clouds-emitted low pleasing sounds and poured down rain of flowers.

As soon as Ānakadundubhi beheld the child, of the complexion of the lotus leaves, having four arms and the mystic mark Śrīvatsa on his breast, he addressed him in terms of love and reverence and represented the fears he entertained of Kaṁsa.

"You are born," said Vasudeva, "O sovereign god of gods, bearer of the shell, the discus and the mace; but now in mercy withhold this your celestial form, for Kaṁsa will assuredly put me to death when he knows that you have descended in my dwelling."

Devakī also exclaimed, "God of gods. who are all things, who comprise all the regions of the world in your person and who by your illusion have assumed the condition of an infant, have compassion upon us and forego this your four-armed shape, nor let Kaṁsa, the impious son of Diti, know of your descent."

So saying, he was silent : and Vasudeva, taking the baby went out that same night; for the guards were all charmed by Yoganidrā, as were the warders at the gates of Mathurā and they obstructed not the passage of Ānakadundubhi. To protect the infant from the heavy rain that fell from the clouds of night, Śeṣa, the many-headed serpent, followed Vasudeva and spread his hoods above their heads; and when the prince, with the child in his arms, crossed the Yamunā river, deep as it was and dangerous with numerous whirlpools the waters were stilled and rose not above his knee. On the bank he saw Nanda and the rest, who had come thither to bring tribute due to Kaṁsa; but they beheld him not.[1] At the same time Yaśodā was also under the influence of Yoganidrā, whom she had brought forth as her daughter and whom the prudent Vasudeva took up, placing his son in her place by the side of the mother : he then quickly returned home. When Yaśodā awoke, she found that she had been delivered of a boy, as black as the dark leaves of the lotus and she was greatly rejoiced.

Vasudeva, bearing off the female infant of Yaśodā , reached his mansion unobserved and entered and placed the child in the bed of Devakī : he then remained as usual. The guards were awakened by the cry of the new-born baby and, starting up, they sent word to Kaṁsa that Devakī had borne a child. Kaṁsa immediately repaired to the residence of Vasudeva, where he seized upon the infant. In vain Devakī convulsively entreated him to relinquish the child : he threw it ruthlessly against a stone; but it rose into the sky and expanded into a gigantic figure, having eight arms, each wielding some formidable weapon. This terrific being laughed aloud and said to Kaṁsa, "What avails it you, Kaṁsa, to have hurled me to the ground? He is born who shall kill you, the mighty one amongst the gods, who was formerly your destroyer. Now quickly secure him and provide for your own welfare." Thus having spoken, the goddess, decorated with heavenly perfumes and garlands and hymned by the spirits of the air, vanished from before the eyes of Bhoja rājā.[2]

NOTES

1. The Bhāgavata more consistently makes Vasudeva find Nanda and the rest fast asleep in their houses and subsequently describes their bringing tribute or tax (kara) to Kaṁsa.

2. Chief of the tribe of Bhoja. a branch of the Yādavas : see Bk. IV. Ch. XIII.

The vile and contemptible denizens of heaven are assiduously plotting against my life, for they dread my prowess : but, heroes, I hold them of no account. What can the impotent Indra or the ascetic Hara, perform? or what can Hari accomplish, except the murder of his foes by fraud? What have we to fear from the Ādityas, the Vasus, the Agnis or any others of the immortals, who have all been vanquished by my resistless arms? Have I not seen the king of the gods, when he had ventured into the conflict, quickly retreat from the field, receiving my shafts upon his back, not bravely upon his breast ? When in resentment he withheld the fertilising showers from my kingdom, did not my arrows compel the clouds to part with their waters, as much as were required? Are not all the monarchs of the earth in terror of my prowess and subject to my orders, save only Jarāsandha my sire?[1] Now, chiefs of the Daitya race, it is my determination to inflict still deeper degradation upon these evil-minded and unprincipled gods. Let therefore every man who is notorious for liberality (in gifts to gods and Brāhmaṇas), every man who is remarkable for his celebration of sacrifices, be put to death, that thus the gods shall be deprived of the means by which they subsist. The goddess who has been born as the infant child of Devakī has announced to me that he is again alive who in a former being was my death. Let therefore active search be made for whatever young children there may be upon earth and let every boy in whom there are signs of unusual vigour be slain without remorse."

"It is in vain," said he to them, "that I have slain all your children, since after all he who is destined to kill me has escaped. It is of no use to regret the past. The children you may hereafter have may enjoy life unto its natural close; no one shall cut it short." Having thus conciliated them, Kaṁsa, alarmed for himself, withdrew into the interior apartments of his palace.

When Vasudeva was set at liberty, he went to the wagon of Nanda and found Nanda there rejoicing that a son was born to him.[1] Vasudeva spoke to him kindly and congratulated him on having a son in his old age. "The yearly tribute," he added, "has been paid to the king and men of property should not tarry near the court, when the business that brought them there has been transacted. Why do you delay, now that your affairs are settled? Up, Nanda, quickly and set off to your own pastures; and let this boy, the son whom Rohiṇī has borne me, accompany you and be brought up by you as this your own son."

Some time after they were settled at Gokula, the female fiend Pūtanā, the child-killer, came thither by night and finding the little Kṛṣṇa asleep, took him up and gave him her breast to suck.[2] Now whatever child is suckled in the night by Pūtanā instantly dies; but Kṛṣṇa, laying hold of the breast with both hands, sucked it with such violence, that he drained it of the life; and the hideous Pūtanā, roaring aloud and giving way in every joint, fell on the ground expiring. The inhabitants of Vraja awoke in alarm at the cries of the fiend, ran to the spot and beheld Pūtanā lying on the earth and Kṛṣṇa in her arms. Yaśodā snatching up Kṛṣṇa, waved over him a cow-tail brush to guard him from harm, whilst Nanda placed dried cow-dung powdered upon his head; he gave him also an amulet,[3] saying at the same time,

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे पञ्चमाशे पञ्चमः अध्यायः॥

May Govinda guard your head; Keśava your neck; Viṣṇu your belly; Janārddana your legs and feet; the eternal and irresistible Nārāyaṇa your face, your arms, your mind and faculties of sense. May all ghosts, goblins and spirits malignant and unfriendly, ever fly you, appalled by the bow, the discus, mace and sword of Viṣṇu and the echo of his shell. May Vaikuṇṭha guard you in the cardinal points; and in the intermediate ones, Madhusūdana. May Ṛṣikeśa defend you in the sky and Mahīdhara upon earth.'' Having pronounced this prayer to avert all evil, Nanda put the child to sleep in his bed underneath the waggon. Beholding the vase carcass of Pūtanā, the cowherds were filled with astonishment and terror.

NOTES

1. It is literally 'went to the cart' or 'waggon ;' नन्दस्य शकटं गतः। as if Nanda and his family dwelt in such a vehicle, as the Scythians are said to have done. The commentator explains Śakaṭa (शकट) the place of loosing or unharnessing the waggon; शकटावमोचनस्थानं। In the Bhāgavata, Vasudeva does not quit Mathurā, but goes to the halting ground of Nanda, who has come to that city to pay his taxes : ययौ तदवमोचनं। explained by the comment, तस्य वसतिस्थानं।

2. In the Hari Vaṁśa this female fiend is described as coming in the shape of a bird.

3. The Rakṣā, the preserver or preservative against charms, is a piece of thread or silk or some more costly material, bound round the wrist or arm, with an appropriate prayer such as that in the text. Besides its application to children, to avert the effects of evil eyes or to protect them against Dains or witches, there is one day in the year, the Rākhī Pūrṇimā or full moon in the month of Śravaṇa (July-August), when it is bound upon the wrists of adults by friendly or kindred Brāhmaṇas, with a short prayer or benediction. The Rākhī is also sent sometimes by persons of distinction and especially by females, to members of a different family or even race and nation, to intimate a sort of brotherly or sisterly adoption. On one occasion, whilst Madhusūdana was asleep underneath the waggon, he cried for the breast and kicking up his feet he overturned the vehicle and all the pots and pans were upset and broken. The cowherds and their wives, hearing the noise, came exclaiming, "Ah ! ah !" and there they found the child sleeping on his back. "Who could have upset the waggon ?" said the cowherds. "This child," replied some boys, who witnessed the circumstance; "we saw him," said they, "crying and kicking the waggon with his feet and so it was overturned: no one else had any thing to do with it." The cowherds were exceedingly astonished at this account; and Nanda, not knowing what to think, took up the boy; whilst Yaśodā offered worship to the broken pieces of pots and to the waggon, with curds, flowers, fruit and unbruised grain.

The initiatory rites requisite for the two boys were performed by Garga, who was sent to Gokula by Vasudeva for that purpose : he celebrated them without the knowledge of the cowherds;[1] and the wise sage, eminent amongst the wise, named the elder of them Rāma and the other Kṛṣṇa. In a short time they began to crawl about the ground, supporting themselves on their hands and knees and creeping everywhere, often amidst ashes and filth. Neither Rohiṇī not Yaśodā was able to prevent them from getting into the cowpens or amongst the calves, where they amused themselves by pulling their tails.

As they disregarded the prohibitions of Yaśodā and rambled about together constantly, she became angry and taking up a stick, followed them and threatened the dark-complexioned Kṛṣṇa with a whipping. Fastening a cord round his waist, she tied him to the wooden mortar,[2] and being in a great passion, she said to him,

"Now, you naughty boy, get away from hence if you can," She then went about her domestic affairs. As soon as she had departed, the lotus-eycd Kṛṣṇa, endeavouring to extricate himself, pulled the mortar after him to the space between two Arjuna trees that grew near together : having dragged the mortar between these trees, it became wedged aviary there and as Kṛṣṇa pulled it through, it pulled down the trunks of the trees.

Hearing the crackling noise, the people of Vraja came to see what was the matter and there they beheld the two large trees, with shattered stems and broken branches, prostrate on the ground, with the child fixed between them, with a rope round his belly, laughing and showing his white little teeth, just budded. It is hence that Kṛṣṇa is called Dāmodara, from the binding of the rope (dāma) round his belly (udara).[3] The elders of the cowherds, with Nanda at their head, looked upon these circumstances with alarm, considering them as of evil omen.

"We cannot remain in this place," said they; "let us go to some other part of the forest; for here many evil signs threaten us with destruction; the death of Pūtanā, the upsetting of the waggon and the fall of the trees without their being blown down by the wind. Let us depart hence without delay and go to Vrindavan, where terrestrial prodigies may no more disturb us."

Having thus resolved, the inhabitants of Vraja communicated their intention to their families and desired them to move without delay. Accordingly they set off with their waggons and their cattle, driving before them their bulls and cows and calves; the fragments of their household stores they threw away and in an instant Vraja was over-spread with flights of crows. Vrindavan was chosen by Kṛṣṇa, whom acts do not affect, for the sake of providing for the nourishment of the kine; for there in the hottest season the new grass springs up as verdantly as in the rains. Having repaired, then, from Vraja to Vrindavan, the inhabitants of the former drew up their wagons in the form of a crescent.[4]

As the two boys, Rāma and Dāmodara, grew up, they were ever together in the same place and engaged in the same boyish sports. They made themselves crests of the peacocks' plumes and garlands of forest flowers and musical instruments of leaves and reeds or played upon the pipes used by the cowherds; their hair was trimmed like the wings of the crow," and they resembled two young princes, portions of the deity of war : they were robust and they roamed about, always laughing and playing, sometimes with each other, sometimes with other boys; driving along with the young cowherds the calves to pasture. Thus the two guardians of the world were keepers of cattle, until they had attained seven years of age, in the cow-pens of Vrindavana.

Then came on the season of the rains, when the atmosphere laboured with accumulated clouds and the quarters of the horizon were blended into one by the driving showers. The waters of the rivers rose and overflowed their banks and spread beyond all bounds, like the minds of the weak and wicked transported beyond restraint by sudden prosperity. The pure radiance of the moon was obscured by heavy vapours, as the lessons of holy writ are darkened by the arrogant scoffs of fools (and unbelievers). The bow of Indra held its place in the heavens all unstrung, like a worthless man elevated by an injudicious prince to honour. The white line of storks appeared upon the back of the cloud, in such contrast as the bright conduct of a man of respectability opposes to the behaviour of a scoundrel. The ever-fitful lightning, in its new alliance with the sky, was like the friendship of a profligate for a man of worth. Overgrown by the spreading grain, the paths were indistinctly traced, like the speech of the ignorant, that conveys no positive meaning.

At this time Kṛṣṇa and Rāma, accompanied by the cow-boys, traversed the forests, that echoed with the hum of bees and the peacock's cry. Sometimes they sang in chorus or danced together; sometimes they sought shelter from the cold beneath the trees; sometimes they decorated themselves with flowery garlands, sometimes with peacocks' feathers; sometimes they stained themselves of various hues with the minerals of the mountain; sometimes weary they reposed on beds of leaves and sometimes they excited their juvenile associates to sing and sometimes they mimicked the cry of the peacock with their pipes.

In this manner participating in various feelings and emotions and affectionately attached to each other, they wandered, sporting and happy, through the wood. At evening tide came Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, like two cow-boys, along with the cows and the cowherds. At evening tide the two immortals, having come to the cow-pens, joined heartily in whatever sports amused the sons of the herdsmen.

NOTES

1. The Bhāgavata describes Garga's interview with Nanda and the inducements of the latter to keep the former's celebration of the Saṅskāras or initiatory rites of the two boys, secret from the Gopas. Garga there describes himself as the Purohita or family priest, of the Yādavas.

2. The Ulūkhala or mortar is a large wooden bowl on a solid stand of timber, both cut out of one piece; the pestle is also of wood; and they are used chiefly for bruising or threshing unwinnowed corn and separating the chaff from the grain. As important agents in household economy, they are regarded as sacred, and even hymned in the Vedas.

3. Our text. and that of the Hari Vaṁśa, take no notice of the legend of Nalakubera and Maṇigrīva, sons of Kubera, who, according to the Bhāgavata, had been metamorphosed, through a curse of Nārada, into these two trees and for whose liberation this feat of Kṛṣṇa was intended.

4. The Hari Vaṁśa, not satisfied with the prodigies which had alarmed the cowherds, adds another, not found, it is believed, anywhere else. The emigration, according to that work, originates, not with the Gopas, but the two boys, who wish to go to Vrindavan and in order to compel the removal, Kṛṣṇa converts the hairs of his body into hundreds of wolves, who so harass and alarm the inhabitants of Vraja. that they determine to abandon their homes.

5. The Kāka-pakṣa. or crow's wing, implies the hair left on each side of the head, the top being shaved.

One day Kṛṣṇa, unaccompanied by Rāma, went to Vṛndāvan : he was attended by a troop of cowherds and gaily decorated with wild flowers. On his way he came to the Yamunā, which was flowing in sportive undulations and sparkling with foam, as if with smiles, as the waves dashed against the borders. Within its bed, however, was the fearful pool of the serpent Kālīya, boiling with the fires of poison;[1] from the fumes of which, large trees upon the bank were blighted and by whose waters, when raised by a gale into the air, birds were scorched. Beholding tills dreadful lake, which was like another mouth of death, Madhusūdana reflected that the wicked and poisonous Kālīya, who had been vanquished by himself (in the person of Garuḍa) and had been obliged to fly from the ocean (where he had inhabited the island Ramaṇaka), must be lurking at its bottom and defiling the Yamunā, the consort of the sea, so that neither men nor cattle could slake their thirst by her waters. Such being the case, he determined to dislodge the Nāga and enable the dwellers of Vraja to frequent the vicinage without fear; for it was the especial purpose he considered of his descent upon earth to reduce to subjection all such violators of law. "Here" thought he, "is a Kadamba tree, which is sufficiently near; I can climb up it and thence leap into the serpent's pool."

Having thus resolved, he bound his clothes tightly about him and jumped boldly into the lake of the serpent-king. The waters, agitated by his plunge amidst them, were scattered to a considerable distance from the bank and the spray falling upon the trees, they were immediately set on fire by the heat of the poisonous vapour combined with the water; and the whole horizon was in a blaze. Kṛṣṇa, having dived into the pool, struck his arms in defiance[2] and the snake-king, hearing the sound, quickly came forth: his eyes were coppery red and his hoods were flaming with deadly venom : he was attended by many other powerful and poisonous snakes, feeders upon air and by hundreds of serpent-nymphs, decorated with rich jewels, whose earrings glittered with trembling radiance as the wearers moved along. Coiling themselves around Kṛṣṇa, they all bit him with teeth from which fiery poison was emitted. Kṛṣṇa's companions, beholding him in the lake, encompassed by the snakes, twining around him, ran off to Vraja, lamenting and bewailing aloud his fate. "Kṛṣṇa," they called out, "has foolishly plunged into the serpent's pool and is there bitten to death by the snake-king! Come and see."

The cowherds and their wives and Yaśodā, hearing this news, which was like a thunderbolt, ran immediately to the pool, frightened out of their senses and crying, "Alas ! alas ! where is he ?" The Gopīs were retarded by Yaśodā, who in her agitation stumbled and slipped at every step; but Nanda and the cowherds and the invincible Rāma hastened to the banks of the Yamunā, eager to assist Kṛṣṇa.

There they beheld him apparently in the power of the serpent-king, encompassed by twining snakes and making no effort to escape. Nanda, as soon as he set his eyes upon his son, became senseless; and Yaśodā also, when she beheld him, lost all consciousness.

The Gopīs, overcome with sorrow, wept and called affectionately and with convulsive sobs, upon Keśava. "Let us all," said they, "plunge with Yaśodā into the fearful pool of the serpent-king. We cannot return to Vraja; for what is day, without the sun? What night, without the moon? What is a herd of heifers, without its lord? What is Vraja, without Kṛṣṇa? Deprived of him, we will go no more to Gokula. The forest will lose its delights; it will be like a lake without water. When this dark lotus leaf complexioned Hari is not present, there is no joy in the maternal dwelling. How strange is this ! And as for you, you cowherds, how, poor beings, will you live amidst the pastures, when you no longer behold the brilliant lotus eyes of Hari? Our hearts have been wield away by the music of his voice. We will not go without Puṇḍarikākṣa to the folds of Nanda. Even now, though held in the coils of the serpent-king, see, friends, how his face brightens with smiles as we gaze upon him."

When the mighty son of Rohiṇī, Balarāma heard these exclamations of the Gopīs and with disdainful glance beheld the cowherds overcome with terror, Nanda gazing fixedly upon the countenance of his son and Yaśodā unconscious, he spoke to Kṛṣṇa in his own character: "What is this, O god of gods ! the quality of mortal is sufficiently assumed; do you not know yourself eternal? You are the centre of creation, as the nave is of the spokes of a wheel. A portion of you have I also been born, as your senior. The gods, to partake of your pastimes as man, have all descended under a like disguise; and the goddesses have come down to Gokula to join in your spores. You, eternal, have last of all appeared below. Wherefore, Kṛṣṇa, do you disregard these divinities, who, as cowherds, are your friends and kin? These sorrowing females, who also are your relations? You have put on the character of man; you have exhibited the tricks of childhood: now let this fierce snake, though armed with venomed tangs, be subdued, (by your celestial vigour)."

Thus reminded of his real character by Rāma, Kṛṣṇa smiled gently and speedily extricated himself from the coils of the snakes. Laying hold of the middle hood of their chief with both his hands, he bent it down and set his foot upon the hitherto undended head and danced upon it in triumph. Wherever the snake attempted to raise his head, it was again trodden down and many bruises were inflicted on the hood by the pressure of the toes of Kṛṣṇa. Trampled upon by the feet of Kṛṣṇa, as they changed position in the dance, the snake fainted and vomited forth much blood[3]. Beholding the head and neck of their lord thus injured and the blood flowing from his mouth, the females of the snake-king implored the clemency of Madhusūdana.

"You are recognised, O god of gods !" they exclaimed; "you are the sovereign of all; you are light supreme, inscrutable; you are the mighty lord, the portion of that supreme light. The gods themselves are unable worthily to praise you, the lord self-existence; how then shall females proclaim your nature ? How shall we fully declare him of whom the egg of Brahmā, made up of earth, sky, water, fire and air, is but a small portion of a part? Holy sages have in vain sought to know your eternal essence. We bow to that form which is the most subtle of atoms, the largest of the large; to him whose birth is without a creator, whose end knows no destroyer and who alone is the cause of duration. There is no wrath in you; for your is the protection of the world; and hence this chastisement of Kālīya. Yet hear us. Women are to be regarded with pity by the virtuous: animals are humanely treated even by fools. Let therefore the author of wisdom have compassion upon this poor creature.

You are the supreme, the progenitor of the supreme (Brahmā) : you are the supreme spirit and from you the supreme proceeds : you are beyond all finite objects; how can I speak your praise? How can I declare his greatness, from whom come Brahmā, Rudra, Candra, Indra, the Maruts, the Aśvins, the Vasus and Ādityas; of whom the whole world is an infinitely small portion, a portion destined to represent his essence; and whose nature, primitive or derived, Brahmā and the immortals do not comprehend? How can I approach him, to whom the gods offer incense and flowers culled from the groves of Nandana; whose incarnate forms the king of the deities ever adores unconscious of his real person; whom the sages, that have withdrawn their senses from all external objects, worship in thought and enshrining his image in the purposes of their hearts, present to it the flowers of sanctity?[4]

It is the nature of snakes to be savage and I am born of their kind : hence this is my nature, not mine offence. The world is created, as it is destroyed, by you; and the species, form and nature of all things in the world are your work. Even such as you have created me in kind, in form and in nature, such I am. and such are my actions : should I act differently, then indeed should I deserve your punishment, for so you have declared[5]. Yet that I have been punished by you is indeed a blessing; for punishment from you alone is a favour. Behold I am now without strength, without poison; deprived of both by you. Spare me my life; I ask no more. Command me what I shall do."

Again, tending upon the herds, Keśava and Rāma wandered through the woods and on one occasion came to a pleasing grove of palms, where dwelt the fierce demon Dhenuka, feeding upon the flesh of deer. Beholding the trees covered with fruit and desirous of gathering it, the cowherds called out to the brothers and said, "See, Rāma; see, Kṛṣṇa; in this grove, belonging to the great Dhenuka, the trees are loaded with ripe fruit, the smell of which perfumes the air : we should like to eat some, will you throw some down?'' As soon as the boys had spoken, Saṁkarṣaṇa and Kṛṣṇa shook the trees and brought down the fruit on the ground.

Hearing the noise of the falling fruit, the fierce and malignant demon Dhenuka, in the form of an ass, hastened to the spot in a great passion and began to kick Rāma on the breast with his hinder heels. Rāma, however, seized him by both hind legs and whirling him round until he expired, tossed his carcass to the top of a palm tree, from the branches of which it struck down abundance of fruit, like rain drops poured upon earth by the wind. The animals that were of kin to Dhenuka came running to his aid; but Kṛṣṇa and Rāma treated them in the same manner, until the trees were laden with dead asses and the ground was strewed with ripe fruit. Henceforward the cattle grazed unobstructed in the palm grove and cropped the new pasturage, where they had never before ventured[1].

NOTES

1. This exploit is related in the Bhāgavata, Hari Vaṁśa and other Vaiṣṇava Purāṇas, much in the same strain, but not always in the same place : it more commonly precedes the legend of the discomfiture of Kālīya.

When the demon in the form of an ass and all his tribe, had been destroyed, the grove of palms became the favourite resort of the Gopas and their wives and the sons of Vasudeva, greatly pleased, repaired to the Bhāṇḍīra fig tree. They continued to wander about, shouting and singing and gathering fruits and flowers from the trees; now driving the cows afar to pasture; now calling them by their names; now carrying the foot-ropes of the kine upon their shoulder; now ornamenting themselves with garlands of forest flowers, they looked like two young bulls when the horns first appear. Attired the one in yellow and the other in sable garments, they looked like two clouds, one white and one black, surmounted by the bow of Indra. Sporting mutually with frolics beneficial to the world, they roamed about like two monarchs over all the collected sovereigns of the earth. Assuming human duties and maintaining the human character, they strayed through the thickets amusing themselves with sports suited to their mortal species and condition, in swinging on the boughs of trees or in boxing and wrestling and hurling stones.

The boys commenced playing at the game of leaping like deer, two and two together.[1]

Govinda was matched with Śrīdāman and Balarāma with Pralamba : the other boys were coupled with one another and went leaping away. Govinda beat his companion and Balarāma his; and the boys who were on Kṛṣṇa's side were also victorious. Carrying one another, they reached the Bhāṇḍīra fig; and from thence those who were victors were conveyed back to the starling-ground by those who were vanquished.

It being Pralamba's duty to carry Saṁkarṣaṇa, the latter mounted upon his shoulders, like the moon riding above a dark cloud; and the demon ran off with him, but did not stop : finding himself, however, unable to bear the weight of Balarāma, he enlarged his bulk and looked like a black cloud in the rainy season, Balarāma beholding him like a scorched mountain, his head crowned with a diadem and his neck hung round with garlands, having eyes as large as cart wheels, a fearful form and shaking the earth with his tread, called out, as he was carried away, to his brother, "Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa, I am carried off by some demon, disguised as a cowherd and huge as a mountain! What shall I do? Tell me, Madhusūdana : the villain runs away with speed!"

Thus reminded by the magnanimous Kṛṣṇa, the powerful Baladeva laughed and squeezed Pralamba with his knees, striking him at the same time on the head and face with his fists, so as to beat out both his eyes. The demon, vomiting blood from his mouth and having his brain forced through the skull, fell upon the ground and expired. The Gopas, beholding Pralamba slain, were astonished and rejoiced and cried out, "Well done," and praised Balarāma: and thus commended by his play-fellows and accompanied by Kṛṣṇa, Bala, after the death of the daitya Pralamba, returned to Gokula.[3]

NOTES

1. Jumping with both feet at once, as deer bound, two boys together, the one that holds out longest or comes to a given point first, is the victor and the vanquished is then bound to carry him to the goal, if not already attained and back again to the starting post, on his shoulders. The Bhāgavata does not specify the game, but mentions that the vanquished carry the victors on their backs.

2. This passage is read and explained differently in different copies. In some it is, अत्रं यथा वाडवाग्निनांबुहिमस्वरूपं परिगृह्य स्वस्थं। हिमाचले भानुमतो शुसङ्काञ्जलत्वमुपैति पुनस्तथैव॥ And this is explained, सामुद्रमम्बु वाडावाख्येन वह्निना अत्रं भक्षितं घनीभूय हिमस्वरूपं कस्तकसंज्ञेनवायुना वाडवाग्निगतेन सूर्य्य नाडीमयेन परिगृह्य गृहीत्वा स्वस्थमाकशस्थं कृतं सन् हिमाचले भवतीति शेषः॥ 'The water of the ocean, devoured by the fire called Vāḍava, becoming condensed or in the form of dew or snow, is seized by the wind called Kastaka, from which the Vāḍava fire has departed, consisting of a pipe of the solar rays and being placed in the air, lies or is on the Himācala' etc. This is rather an awkward and confused representation of the notion and the other reading is somewhat preferable : it consists simply in substituting कास्त for स्वस्थं that is, according to the commentary, अम्बु वाडवाग्निना जग्धं कास्तं केन वायुना वाडवाग्निगतेनार्करस्मिनाडीमयेन अस्तं हिमाचले क्षिप्तं हिमरूपं परिगृह्य स्थितं सत्। 'The water devoured by the fire is thrown by the wind Ka, made of a solar ray etc.; on the Himācala, where it assumes the form of snow;' and so on. However disfigured by inaccurate views of some of the instruments in operation, the physiology is in the main very correct and indicates accurate observation of natural phenomena. The waters of the ocean, converted into vapour by solar heat, are raised by the same influence into the air and thence borne by the winds to the summits of lofty mountain ranges, where they are arrested by a diminished temperature, descend in the form of snow and again supply the streams that perpetually restore to the sea the treasures of which it is as perpetually plundered.

3. According to the Hari Vaṁśa the gods themselves praised this proof of Rāma's strength (bala) and hence he derived the name of Balarāma.

Parāśara said– Whilst Keśava and Rāma were sporting thus in Vraja, the rainy season ended and was succeeded by the season of autumn, when the lotus is full blown. The small Saphari fish, in their watery burrows, were oppressed by the heat, like a man by selfish desires, who is devoted to his family. The peacocks, no longer animated by passion, were silent amidst the woods, like holy saints, who have come to know the unreality of the world.

The clouds, of shining whiteness, exhausted of their watery wealth, deserted the atmosphere, like those who have acquired wisdom and depart from their homes. Evaporated by the rays of the autumnal sun, the lakes were dried up, like the hearts of men when withered by the contact of selfishness The pellucid waters of the season were suitably embellished by white water-lilies, as are the minds of the pure by the apprehension of truth. Brightly in the starry sky shone the moon with undiminished orb, like the saintly being, who has reached the last stage of bodily existence in the company of the pious.

The rivers and lakes slowly retired from their banks, as the wise by degrees shrink from the selfish attachment that connects them with wife and child. First abandoned by the waters of the lake, the swans again began to congregate, like false ascetics, whose devotions are interrupted and they are again assailed by innumerable afflictions. The ocean was still and calm and exhibited no undulations, like the perfect sage, who has completed his course of restraint and has acquired undisturbed tranquillity of spirit. Everywhere the waters were as clear and pure as the minds of the wise, who behold Viṣṇu in all things.

The autumnal sky was wholly free from clouds, like the heart of the ascetic, whose cares have been consumed by the fire of devotion. The moon allayed the fervours of the sun, as discrimination alleviates the pain to which egotism gives birth. The clouds of the atmosphere, the muddiness of the earth, the discoloration or the waters, were all removed by autumn, as abstraction detaches the senses from the objects of perception. The exercise of inspiring, suppressing and expiring the vital air, was as if performed daily by the waters of the lakes (as they were full and stationary and then again declined)[1].

At this season, when the skies were bright with stars, Kṛṣṇa, repairing to Vraja, found all the cowherds busily engaged in preparing for a sacrifice to be offered to Indra[2]; and going to the elders, he asked them, as it out of curiosity, what festival of Indra it was in which they took so much pleasure.

Nanda replied to his question and said, "Śatakratu or Indra is the sovereign of the clouds and of the waters : sent by him, the former bestow moisture upon the earth, whence springs the grain, by which we and all embodied beings subsist; with which also and with water, we please the gods : hence too these cows bear calves and yield milk and are happy and well nourished. So when the clouds are seen distended with rain, the earth is neither barren of corn, nor bare of verdure, nor is man distressed by hunger. Indra, the giver of water, having drunk the milk of earth by the solar ray, sheds it again upon the earth for the sustenance of all the world. On this account all sovereign princes offer with pleasure sacrifices to Indra at the end of rains and so also do we and so do other people."

Parāśara said– When Kṛṣṇa heard this speech from Nanda in regard to the worship of Indra, he determined to put the king of the celestials into a passion and replied, "We, father, are neither cultivators of the soil, nor dealers in merchandise; we are sojourners in forests and cows are our divinities. There are four branches of knowledge, logical. scriptural, practical and political[3]. Hear me describe what practical science is Agriculture, commerce and tending of cattle; the knowledge of these three professions constitutes practical science. Agriculture is the subsistence of farmers; buying and selling, of traders. Kine are our support. Thus the knowledge of means of support is threefold.

तदा सिंहादिरुपैस्तान् घातयन्ति महीधराः॥ ३५॥

The object that is cultivated by any one should be to him as his chief divinity; that should be venerated and worshipped, as it is his benefactor. He who worships the deity of another and diverts from him the reward that is his due, obtains not a prosperous station either in this world or in the next. Where the land ceases to be cultivated there are bounds assigned, beyond which commences the forest; the forests are bounded by the hills and so far do our limits extend. We are not shut in with doors, nor confined within walls; we have neither fields nor houses; we wander about happily wherever we list, travelling in our waggons.[4] The spirits of these mountains, it is said, walk the woods in whatever forms they will or in their proper persons sport upon their own precipices. If they should be displeased with those who inhabit the forests, then, transformed to lions and beasts of prey, they will kill the offenders.

गिरियज्ञस्त्वयं तस्माद् गोयज्ञश्च प्रवर्त्यताम्।

सर्वघोषस्य सन्दोहो गृह्यतां मा विचार्य्यताम्।
भोज्यन्तां तेन वै विप्रास्तथा ये चाभिवाञ्छकाः॥३९॥

We then are bound to worship the mountains; to offer sacrifices to cattle. What have we to do with Indra? Cattle and mountains are our gods. Brāhmaṇas offer worship with prayer; cultivators of the earth adore their landmarks; but we who tend our herds in the forests and mountains should worship them and our kine. Let prayer and offerings then be addressed to the mountains Govardhana and kill a victim in due form. Let the whole station collect their milk without delay and feed with it the Brāhmaṇs and all who may desire to partake of it.

ततः कृत्वा भवेत् प्रीतिर्गवामद्रेस्तथा मम॥४१॥

When the oblations have been presented and the Brāhmaṇas have been fed, let the Gopas circumambulate the cows, decorated with garlands of autumnal flowers. If the cowherds will attend to these suggestions, they will secure the favour of the mountain, of the cattle and also mine.

When Nanda and the other Gopas heard these words of Kṛṣṇa, their faces expanded with delight and they said that he had spoken well. "You have judged rightly, child," exclaimed they; "we will do exactly as you have proposed and offer adoration to the mountain."

Accordingly the inhabitants of Vraja worshipped the mountain, presenting to it curds and milk and flesh; and they fed hundreds and thousands of Brāhmaṇas and many other guests, who came to the ceremony, even as Kṛṣṇa had enjoined : and when they had made their offerings, they circumambulated the cows and the bulls, that bellowed as loud as roaring clouds.

Upon the summit of Govardhana, Kṛṣṇa presented himself, saying, "I am the mountain" and partook of much food presented by the Gopas; whilst in his own form as Kṛṣṇa he ascended the hill along with cowherds and worshipped his other self[5]. Having promised them many blessings, the mountain-person of Kṛṣṇa vanished; and the ceremony being completed, the cowherds returned to their station.

NOTES

1. A set of very poor quibbles upon the terms of the Prāṇāyāma : or, Purāṇa, drawing in the breath through one nostril; literally, 'filling :' Kumbhaka, closing the nostrils and suppressing the breath; keeping it stationary or confined, as it were in a Kumbha or water-pot : and Recaka, opening the other nostril and emitting the breath; literally, 'purging' or 'depletion.' The waters of the reservoirs replenished in the beginning of the autumnal season by the previous rains, remain for a while full, until they are drawn off for irrigation or reduced by evaporation : thus representing the three operations of Purāṇa, Kumbhaka and Recaka.

2. No public worship is offered to Indra at present; and the only festival in the Hindu calendar, the Śakradhvajotthāna, the erection of a flag in honour of Śakra or Indra, should be held on the twelfth or thirteenth of Bhādra, which is in the very middle of the rainy season; according to the Tithi Tatva, following the authority of the Kālikā and Bhaviṣyottara Purāṇas. The Śakradhvajotthāna is also a rite to be performed by kings and princes. It may be doubted, therefore, if the text intends any particular or appointed celebration.

3. Or, Ānvīkṣikī (आन्वीक्षिकी), the science of inquiring by reasoning, Tarka (तर्क) or logic : Trayī (त्रयी), the three Vedas collectively or the doctrines they teach : Vārttā (वार्त्ता), rendered 'practical,' is the knowledge of the means of acquiring subsistence (वृत्तिः) : the fourth is Daṇḍanīti (दण्डनीतिः), the science of government, both domestic and foreign.

4. These nomadic habits are entirely lost sight of in the parallel passages of those Purāṇas in which the juvenile life of Kṛṣṇa is narrated. The text of the Hari Vaṁśa is in most of the other verses precisely the same as that of the Viṣṇu Purāṇa, putting however into the mouth of Kṛṣṇa a long additional eulogium on the season of autumn.

5. The Hari Vaṁśa says, 'an illusory Kṛṣṇa, having become the mountain, ate the flesh that was offered;' मांसंचमायकृष्णो। गिरिर्भूत्वा समश्नते। Of course the 'personified' mountain is intended, as appears from several of the ensuing passages; as for instance, he says presently. 'I am satisfied; and then in his divine form he smiled;' संतृप्ततोस्मीतिदिव्तेन रूपेण प्रजहास वै। The Hari Vaṁśa affords here, as in so many other places, proofs of its Dakhini origin. It is very copious upon the homage paid to the cattle and their decoration with garlands and plumes of peacocks' feathers, of which our text takes no notices. But in the south of India there is a very popular festival, that of the Punjab, scarcely known in the north, when cattle are decorated and worshipped; a celebration which has no doubt suggested to the compiler of the Hari Vaṁśa the details which he describes.

Indra, being thus disappointed of his offerings, was exceedingly angry and thus addressed a cohort of his attendant clouds, called Samvarttaka: "Ho, clouds" he said, "hear my words and without delay execute what I command. The insensate cowherd Nanda, assisted by his fellows, has withheld the usual offerings to us, relying upon the protection of Kṛṣṇa. Now, therefore, afflict the cattle, that are their sustenance and whence their occupation is derived, with rain and wind. Mounted upon my elephant, as vast as a mountain peak, I will give you aid in strengthening the tempest."

When Indra ceased, the clouds, obedient to his commands, came down, in a tearful storm of rain and wind, to destroy the cattle. In an instant the earth, the points of the horizon and the sky, were all blended into one by the heavy and incessant shower. The clouds roared aloud, as if in terror of the lightning's scourge, poured down uninterrupted torrents. The whole earth was enveloped in impenetrable darkness by the thick and volumed clouds; and above, below and on every side, the world was water. The cattle, pelted by the storm, shrunk cowering into the smallest size or gave up their breath : some covered their calves with their flanks and some beheld their young ones carried away by the flood. The calves, trembling in the wind, looked piteously at their mothers or implored in low moans, as it were, the succour of Kṛṣṇa. Hari, beholding all Gokula agitated with alarm, cowherds, cowherdesses and cattle all in a state of consternation, thus reflected :"This is the work of Mahendra, in resentment of the prevention of his sacrifice and it is incumbent on me to defend this station of herdsmen. I will lift up this spacious mountain from its stony base and hold it up, as a large umbrella, over the cow-pens."

Having thus determined, Kṛṣṇa immediately plucked up the mountain Govardhana and held it aloft with one hand in sport, saying to the herdsmen, "Lo the mountain is on high; enter beneath it quickly and it will shelter you from the storm; here you will be secure and at your case in places defended from the wind : enter without delay and fear not that the mountain will fall." Upon this, all the people, with their herds and their wagons and goods and the Gopīs, distressed by the rain, repaired to the shelter of the mountain, which Kṛṣṇa held steadily over their heads; and Kṛṣṇa, as he supported the mountain, was contemplated by the dwellers of Vraja with joy and wonder; and, as their eyes opened wide with astonishment and pleasure, the Gopas and Gopīs sang his praise. For seven days and nights did the vast clouds sent by Indra rain upon the Gokula of Nanda to destroy its inhabitants, but they were protected by the elevation of the mountain; and the slayer of Bala, Indra, being foiled in his purpose, commanded the clouds to cease. The threats of Indra having been fruitless and the heavens clear, all Gokula came forth from its shelter and returned to its own abode. Then Kṛṣṇa, in the sight of the surprised inhabitants of the forests, restored the great mountain Govardhana to its original site.[1]

1. It seems not unlikely that this legend has some reference to the caves or cavern temples in various parts of India. A remarkable representation of it occurs upon the sculptured rocks of Mahābalipura. It is related much to the same purport in the Bhāgavata. Śiśupāla, ridiculing the exploit, asserts that Govardhana was nothing more than an ant hill.

After Gokula had been saved by the elevation of the mountain, Indra became desirous of beholding Kṛṣṇa. The conqueror of his foes accordingly mounted his vast elephant Airāvata, and came to Govarddhana, where the king of the gods beheld the mighty Dāmodara tending cattle, and assuming the person of a cow-boy, and, although the preserver of the whole world, surrounded by the sons of the herdsmen: above his head he saw Garuḍa, the king to birds, invisible to mortals, spreading out his wings to shade the head of Hari. Alighting from his elephant, and addressing him apart, Śakra, his eyes expanding with pleasure, thus spoke to Madhusūdana: "Hear, Kṛṣṇa, the reason why I have come hither; why I have approached you; for you could not otherwise conceive it. You, who are the supporter of all, have descended upon earth, to relieve her of her burden, in resentment of my obstructed rites I sent the clouds to deluge Gokula, and they have done this evil deed. You, by raising up the mountain, have preserved the cattle; and of a verity I am much pleased, O hero, with thy wondrous deed.

The object of the gods is now, methinks, accomplished, since with thy single hand you hast raised aloft this chief of mountains. I have now come by desire of the cattle[1], grateful for their preservation, in order to install you as Upendra; and, as the Indra of the cows, you shall be called Govinda."[2] Having thus said, Mahendra took a ewer from his elephant Airāvata, and with the holy water it contained performed the regal ceremony of aspersion. The cattle, as the rite was celebrating, deluged the earth with their milk.

When Indra had, by direction of the kine, inaugurated Kṛṣṇa, the husband of Śacī said to him affectionately, "I have thus performed what the cows enjoined me. Now, illustrious being, hear what farther I propose, with a view to facilitate your task. A portion of me has been born as Arjuna, the son of Pṛthā: let him ever be defended by you, and he will assist you in bearing thy burden. He is to be cherished by you, Madhusūdana, like another self."

To this Kṛṣṇa replied, "I know thy son, who has been born in the race of Bharata, and I will befriend him as long as I continue upon earth. As long as I am present, invincible Śakra, no one shall be able to subdue Arjuna in fight. When the great demon Kaṅsa has been slain, and Ariṣṭa, Keśin, Kuvalayāpīḍa, Naraka, and other fierce Daityas, shall have been put to death, there will take place a great war, in which the burden of the earth will be removed. Now therefore depart, and be not anxious on account of thy son : for no foe shall triumph over Arjuna whilst I am present. For his sake I will restore to Kuntī all her son, with Yudhiṣṭhira at their head, unharmed, when he Bhārata war is at an end."

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे पञ्चमांशे द्वादशः अध्यायः॥

Upon Kṛṣṇa's ceasing to speak, he and Indra mutually embraced; and the latter, mounting his elephant Airāvata, returned to heaven. Kṛṣṇa, with the cattle and the herdsmen, went his way to Vraja, where the wives of the Gopas watched for his approach.

NOTES

1. Gobhiacha chodita (गोभिश्च चोदितः); that is, 'delegated,' says the commentator, 'by the cow of plenty. Kāmadhenu, and other celestial kine, inhabitants of Goloka, the heaven of cows:' but this is evidently unauthorized by the text, as celestial cattle could not be grateful for preservation upon earth; and the notion of Goloka, a heaven of cows and Kṛṣṇa, is a modern piece of mysticism, drawn from such sectarial works as the Brahma Vaivartta Purāṇa and Hari Vaṃśa.

2. The purport of Indra's speech is to explain the meaning of two of Kṛṣṇa's names, Upendra and Govinda. The commentators on the Amara Koṣa agree in explaining the first, the younger brother of Indra, इन्द्रानुजत्वादुपेन्द्रः। conformably to the synonym that immediately follows in the text of Amara, Indrāvaraja (इन्द्रावरजः); a name that occurs also in the Mahābhārata: Kṛṣṇa, as the son of Devakī, who is an incarnation of Aditi, being born of the latter subsequently to Indra, Govinda is he who knows, finds, or tends cattle; Gām vindati (गां विन्दति). The Paurāṇik etymology makes the latter the Indra (इन्द quasi इन्द्र) of cows; and in this capacity he may well be considered as a minor or inferior Indra, such being the proper sense of the term Upapurāṇa 'a minor Purāṇa,' &c. The proper import of the word Upendra has, however, been anxiously distorted by the sectarian followers of Kṛṣṇa. Thus the commentator on our text asserts that Upa is here synonymous with Upari (उपरि), and that Upendratwa, "the station of Upendra,' means 'rule in the heaven of heavens, Goloka,' a new creation of this sect, above Satya-loka, which, in the uncorrupt Paurānik system, is the highest of the seven Lokas: see Bk. II. Ch. VII. So the Hari Vaṃśa makes Indra say, ममोपरि यथेन्द्रस्त्वं स्थापितो गोभिरोश्वरः उपेन्द्र इति कृष्ण त्वां गास्यन्ति दिवि देवताः। As you, Kṛṣṇa, are appointed, by the cows, Indra superior to me, therefore the deities in heaven shall call you Upendra.' The Bhāgavata does not introduce the name though it no doubt alludes to it in making the divine cow Surabhi, who is said to have come from Goloka with India, address Kṛṣṇa, and say, इन्द्रं नस्त्वाभिषेक्ष्यामो ब्रह्मणा नोदितावयं। We, intructed by Brahmā, will crown you as our Indra' Accordingly Kṛṣṇa has the water of the Ganges thrown over him by the elephant of Indra, and India, the gods and sages praise him, and salute him by the appellation of Govinda. The Hari Vaṃśa assigns thus to Indra alone, who says, 'I am only the Indra of the gods; you have attained the rank of Indra of the kine, and they shall for ever celebrate you on earth as Govinda:' अहंकिलेन्द्रो देवानां त्वं गवामिन्द्रतां गतः। गोविन्द इति लोकास्त्वां स्तोष्यन्ति भुवि शाश्वतं॥ All this is very different from the sober account of our text, and is undoubtedly of comparatively recent origin.

After Śakra had departed, the cowherds said to Kṛṣṇa, whom they had seen holding up Govarddhana, "We have been preserved, together with our cattle, from a great peril, by your supporting the mountain above us; but this is very astonishing child's play, unsuitable to the condition of a herdsman, and all thy actions are those of a god. Tell us what is the meaning of all this, Kālīya has been conquered in the lake; Pralamba has been killed; Govarddhana has been lifted up: our minds are filled with amazement. Assuredly we repose at the feet of Hari, O you of unbounded might!

for, having witnessed thy power, we cannot believe you to be a man. Thy affection, Keśava, for our women and children, and for Vraja; the deeds that you hast wrought, which all the gods would have attempted in vain; they boyhood, and thy prowess; thy humiliating birth amongst us; are contradictions that fill us with doubt, whenever we think of them. Yet reverence be to you whether you be a god, or a demon, or a Gandharva, or whatever we may deem you; for you are our friend."

When they had cndcd, Kṛṣṇa remained silent for some time, as if hurt and offended, and then replied to them,

Kṛṣṇa replied– 'Herdsmen, if you are not ashamed of my relationship; if 1 have merited your praise; what occasion is there for you to engage in any discussion concerning me? If yon have any regard for me; if I have deserved your praise; thcn be satisfied to know that 1 am your kinsman. But Kṛṣṇa, observing the clear sky bright with the autumnal moon, and the air perfumed with the fragrance of the wild water-lily, in whose buds the clustering bees were murmuring their songs, felt inclined to join with the Gopīs in sport. Accordingly he and Rāma commenced singing sweet low strains in various measures, such as the women loved; and they, as soon as they heard the melody, quitted their homes, and hastened to meet the foe of Madhu.

One damsel gently sang an accompaniment to his song; another attentively listened to his melody: one calling out upon his name, then shrunk abashed; whilst another, more bold, and instigated by affection, pressed close to his side: one, as she sallied forth, beheld some of the seniors of the family, and dared not venture, contenting herself with meditating on Kṛṣṇa with closed eyes, and entire devotion, by which immediately all acts of merit were effaced by rapture, and all sin was expiated by regret at not beholding him: and others, again, reflecting upon the cause of the world, in the form of the supreme Brahma, obtained by their sighing final emancipation.

Thus surrounded by the Gopīs, Kṛṣṇa thought lovely moonlight night of autumn propitious to the Rāsa dance.[1] Many of the Gopīs imitated the different actions of Kṛṣṇa, and in his absence wandered through Vrindāvan, representing his person. "I am Kṛṣṇa," cries one; "behold the elegance of my movements. "I am Kṛṣṇa," exclaims another; "listen to my song." "Vile Kālīya, stay! for I am Kṛṣṇa," is repeated by a third, slapping her arms in defiance. A fourth calls out, "Herdsmen, fear nothing; the danger of the storm is over, for, lo 1 lift up Govarddhana for your shelter." And a fifth proclaims, "Now let the heads graze where they will, for I have destroyed Dhenuka."

Having left her in an arrogant mood, because he had offered her flowers, the son of Nanda has gone by this road; for see, unable to follow him with equal steps, his associate has here tripped along upon her toes and holding his hand the damsel has passed, as is evident from the uneven and intermingled footsteps. Undoubtedly he promised that he would quickly come again, for here are his own footsteps returning with speed. Here he has entered the thick forest, impervious to the rays of the moon, and his steps can be traced no farther." Hopeless then of beholding Kṛṣṇa, the Gopīs rcturned, and repaired to the banks of the Yamunā, where they sang his songs; and presently they behcld the preserver of the three worlds, with a smiling aspect, hastening towards them: on which, one exclaimed, "Kṛṣṇa! Kṛṣṇa!" unable to articulate any thing else: another affected to contract her forehead with frowns, as drinking with the bees of her eyes the lotus of the face of Hari: another, closing her cyelids, contemplated internally his form, as if engaged in an act of devotion.

Then Mādhava, coming amongst them, conciliated some with soft speeches, some with gentle looks, and some he took by the hand; and the illustrious deity sported with them in the stations of the dance. As each of the Gopīs, however, attempted to keep in one place, close to the side of Kṛṣṇa, the circle of the dance could not be constructed, and he therefore took each by the hand, and when their eyelids were shut by the effects of such touch, the circle was formed[3] Then proceeded the dance to the music of their clashing bracelets, and songs that celebrated in suitable strain the charms of the autumnal season. Kṛṣṇa sang the moon of autumn, a mine of gentle radiance! but the nymphs repeated the praises of Kṛṣṇa alone.

At times, one of them, wearied by the revolving dance, threw her arms, ornamented with tinkling bracelets, round the neck of the destroyer of Madhu: another, skilled in the are of singing his praises, embraced him. The drops of perspiration from the arms of Hari were like fertilizing rain, which produced a crop of down upon the temples of the Gopīs, Kṛṣṇa sang the strain that was appropriate to the dance. The Gopīs repeatedly exclaimed, "Bravo, Kṛṣṇa!" to his song.

When leading, they followed him, when returning, they encountered him; and, whether he went forwards or backwards, they ever attended on his steps. Whilst frolicking thus with the Gopīs, they considered every instant without him a myriad of years; and, prohibited in vain by husbands, fathers, brothers, they went forth at night to sport with Kṛṣṇa, the object of their affection. Thus the illimitable being, the benevolent remover of all imperfections, assumed the character of youth amongst the females of the herdsmen of Vraja; pervading their natures, and that of their lords, by his own essence, all diffusive like the wind : for even as in all creatures the elements of ether, fire, earth, water, and air, are comprehended, so also is he every where present, and in all.

NOTES

1. The Rāsa dance is danced by men and women, holding each other's hands, and going round in a circle, singing the airs to which they dance. According to Bharata, the airs are various both in melody and time, and the number of persons should not exceed sixty-four : अनेकनर्त्तकीयोज्यौ चित्ततालललयान्वितं। आचतुः षष्टियुग्मत्वाद्रासकं मसृणोद्धतं॥

2. The soles of the feet of a deity are usually marked by a variety of emblematical figures: this is carried to the greatest extravagance by the Buddhists, the mark on the feet of Gautama being 130: see Trans. R. As. Sac. III. 70.' It is a decoration very moderately employed by the Hindus.

3. This is a rather inexplicit statement, but the comment makes it clear, Kṛṣṇa, it is said, in order to form the circle, takes each damsel by the hand, and leads her to her place: there he quits her : but the effect of the contact is such, that it deprives her of the power of perception, and she contentedly takes the hand of her female neighbour, thinking it to be Kṛṣṇa's. The Bhāgavata is bolder, and asserts that Kṛṣṇa multiplied himself, and actually stood between each two damsels: 'रासोत्सवः सम्प्रवृत्तो गोपीमण्डलमण्डितः। योगेश्वरेण कृष्णेन तासां मध्ये द्वयोर्द्वयो प्रविष्टेन इति॥ 'The Rāsa dance, formed of a circle graced by the Gopīs, was then led off by the Lord of magic, Kṛṣṇa having placed himself in the midst of every two of the nymphs.' The Hari Vaṃśa intimates the same, though not very fully: तास्तुपंक्तीकृता सर्वा रमयन्ति मनोरमम्। गायन्त्याः कृष्णचरितं द्वन्द्वशो गोपकन्यकाः॥ 'Then all the nymphs of the cowherds, placing themselves in couples in a row, engaged in pleasant diversion, singing the deeds of Kṛṣṇa,' The Pañkti, or row, is said by the commentator to mean here, the Maṇḍala, or ring; and the 'couples' to imply that Kṛṣṇa was between every two, He quotes a verse to this effect from some other Vaiṣṇava work: अङ्गनामङ्गनामन्तरे माधवो माधवः माधवं चान्तरे चाङ्गना संजगौ वेणुना देवकीनन्दनः॥ 'Between each two damsels was Mādhava, and between each two Mādhavas was a nymph : and the son of Dcvakī played on the flute:' for, in fact, Kṛṣṇa is not only dancing with each, but also by himself in the centre: for this the commentator on the Hari Vaṃśa cites a passage from the Vedas: वस्ते पुरुरूपो वपूंसि ऊर्ध्वा तस्थौ त्र्यविं रेरिहाणाः॥ Literally, The many formed being) assumes (various) bodies. One form stood apart, occupying triple observance'. Now if the verse be genuine, it probably refers to something that has little to do with Kṛṣṇa; but it is explained to apply to the Rāsa; the form of Kṛṣṇa being supposed to be meant as wholly distinct from the Gopīs, and yet being bebeld by everyone of them, on each side and in front of her. In the meditation upon Kṛṣṇa, which is enjoined in the Brahma Vaivartta, he is to be contemplated in the centre of the Rāsa Maṇḍala, in association with his favourite Rādhā; but the Maṇḍala described in that work is not a ring of dancers, but a circle of definite space at Vṛndāvana, within which Kṛṣṇa, Rādhā, and the Gopīs divert themselves, not very decorously. This work has probably given the tone to the style in which the annual festival, the Rāsa Yātrā, is celebrated in various parts of India, in the month of Kārtika, upon the sun's entrance into Libra,' by nocturnal dances, and representations of the sports of Kṛṣṇa. A circular dance of men and women, however, does not form any prominent feature at these entertainmt and it may be doubted if it is ever performed. Some of the earliest labourers in the field of Hindu mythology have thought this circular dance to typify the dance of the planets round the sun (Maurice, Ancient History of the Hindus 1.108. II. 356); but there is no particular number assigned to the performers by any of the Hindu authorities, beyond its limitation to sixty-four. At the Rāsa Maṇḍala of the Brahma Vaivartta, Rādhā is accompained by thirty-six of her most particular friends amongst the Gopīs, but they are each attended by thousands of inferior personages, and none of the crowd are left without male multiples of Kṛṣṇa. The only mysticism hinted at in that Purāṇa, is, that these are all one with Kṛṣṇa: the varied vital conditions of one spirit being represented by the Gopīs and the illusory manifestations of Kṛṣṇa; he himself being supreme unmodified soul.

इति श्रीविष्णुराणे पञ्चमांशे चतुर्दशः अध्यायः॥

One evening, whilst Kṛṣṇa and the Gopīs ware amusing themselves in the dance, the demon Ariṣṭa, disguished as a savage bull, came to the spot, after having spread alarm through the station. His colour was that of a cloud charged with rain; he had vase horns, and his eyes were like two fiery suns : as he moved, he ploughed up the ground with his hoofs: his tongue was repeatedly licking his lips ; his tail was erect; the sinews of his shoulders were firm, and between them rose a hump of enormous dimensions, his haunches were soiled with ordure, and he was a terror to the herds; his dewlap hung low, and his face was marked with scars from butting against the trees, Terrifying all the kine, the demon who perpetually haunts the forests in the shape of a bull, destroying hermits and ascetics, advanced. Beholding an animal of such a formidable aspect, the herdsmen and their women were exceedingly frightened, and called aloud on Kṛṣṇa, who came to their succour, shouting and slapping his arm in defiance. When the Daitya "heard the noise, be turned upon his challenger, and fixing his eyes and pointing his horns at the belly of Keśava, he ran furiously upon the youth, Kṛṣṇa stirred not from his post, but, smiling in sport and derision, awaited the near approach of the bull, when he seized him as an alligator would have done, and held him firmly by the horns, whilst he pressed his sides with his knees. Having thus humbled his pride, and held him captive by his horns, he wrung his throat, as if it bad been a piece of wet cloth; and then tearing off one of the horns, he beat the fierce demon with it until he died, vomiting blood from his mouth. Seeing him slain, the herdsmen glorified Kṛṣṇa, as the companies of the celestials of old praised Indra, when he triumphed over the Asura Jambha.[1]

After these things had come to pass, Ariṣṭa the bull-demon and Dhenuka and Pralamba had been slain, Govarddhana had been lifted up, the serpent Kālīya had been subdued, the two trees had been broken, the female fiend Pūtanā had been killed, and the waggon had been overturned, Nārada went to Kaṅsa, and related to him the whole, beginning with the transference of the child from Devakī to Yaśodā.

Hearing this from Nārada, Kaṅsa was highly incensed with Vāsudeva, and bitterly reproached him, and all the Yādavas, in an assembly of the tribe. Then reflecting what was to be done, he determined to destroy both Kṛṣṇa and Rāma whilst they were yet young, and before they had attained to manly vigour: for which purpose he resolved to invite them from Vraja, under pretext of the solemn rite of the lustration of arms, when he would engage them in a trial of strength with his chief boxers, Cāṇūra and Muṣṭika, by whom they would assuredly be killed. "I will send," he said, "the noble Yadu, Akrūra the son of Swaphalka, to Gokula, to bring them hither: I will order the fierce Keśin, who haunts the woods of Vṛndāban, to attack them, and he is of unequalled might, and will surely kill them; or if they arrive here, my elephant Kuvalayāpīḍa shall trample to death these two cow-boy sons of Vasudeva."

"Lord of liberal gifts,[1] attend to my words, and, out to friendship for me, perform my orders. Ascend your chariot and go hence to the station of the herdsman Nanda. Two vile boys, portions of Viṣṇu, have been born there, for the express object of effecting my destruction. On the fourteenth lunation I have to celebrate the festival of arms,[2] and I wish them to be brought here by you, to take part in the games, and that the people may see them engage in a boxing match with my two dexterous athlete:, Chāṇūra and Muṣṭika; or haply my elephant Kuvalayāpīḍa, driven against them by his rider, shall kill these two iniquitous youngsters, sons of Vasudeva. When they are out of the way, I will put to death Vasudeva himself, the cowherd Nanda, and my foolish father, Ugrasena, and I will seize upon the herds and flocks, and all the possessions, of the rebellious Gopas, who have ever been my foes. Except you, lord of liberality, all the Yādavaa are hostile to me; but I will devise schemes for their extirpation, and I shall then reign over my kingdom, in concert with you, without any annoyance. Through regard for me, therefore, do you go as I direct you; and you shall command the cowherds to bring in with speed their supplies of milk and butter and curds."

Being thus instructed, the illustrious Akrūra readily undertook to visit Kṛṣṇa, and, ascending his stately chariot, he went forth from the city of Mathurā.

NOTES

1. Dānapati– The epithet refers to Akrūra's possession of the Syamantaka gem (see Bk. IV. Ch. XIII); although, as here used by Kaṅsa, it is an anachronism, the gem not becoming his until after Kṛṣṇa's maturity.

2. Dhanurmaha (धनुर्महः): the same phrase occurs in the different authorities. In its ordinary acceptation it would imply any military festival. There is one of great celebrity, which, in the south of India, closes the Dasaharā. or festival of Durgā, when military exercises are performed and a field is ravaged, as typical of the opening of a campain. Worship is paid to military implements. The proper day for this is the Vijaya daśamī or tenth of the light half of Āświn, falling about the end to September or beginning of October. Trans. Bombay Sac. Ill, 73; also Amara Koṣa. under the word लोहाभिसारः (Lohābhisāra). Both our text and that of the Bhāgavata however, intimate the celebration of the feast in question, on the fourteenth day of the fortnight (in what month is not specified), and an occasional 'passage of arms,' therefore is all that is intended. The fourteenth day of the light lunation of any month is commonly held appropriate for a holiday, or religious rite. It will bc seen in the sequel, that the leading feature of the ceremonial was intended to have been a trial of archery, spoiled by Kṛṣṇa's breaking the bow that was to have been used on the occasion.

Keśin, confiding in his prowess, having received the commands of Kaṅsa, set off to the woods of Vṛndāvana, with the intention to destroying Kṛṣṇa. He came in the shape of a steed, spurning the earth with his hoofs, scattering the clouds with his mane, and springing in his paces beyond the orbits of the sun and moon. The cowherds and their females, hearing his neighings, were struck with terror, and fled to Govinda for protection, calling upon him to save them. In a voice deep as the roaring of the thundercloud, Kṛṣṇa replied to them,

Come on, wretch– I am Kṛṣṇa and I will knock all thy teeth down thy throat, as the wielder of the trident did to Pushan.[1]" Thus defying him to combat, Govinda went to encounter Keśin. The demon ran upon him, with his mouth opened wide; but Kṛṣṇa enlarging the bulk of his arm, thrust it into his mouth, and wrenched out the teeth, which fell from his jaws like fragments of white clouds. Still the arm of Kṛṣṇa, in the throat of the demon, continued to enlarge, like a malady increasing from its commencement till it ends in dissolution. From his torn lips the demon vomited foam and blood; his eyes rolled in agony; his joints gave way; he beat the earth with his feet; his body was covered with perspiration; he became incapable of any effort. The formidable demon, having his mouth rent open by the arm of Kṛṣṇa, fell down, torn asunder like a tree struck by lightning: he lay separated into two portions, each having two legs, half a back, half a tail, one ear, one, eye, and one nostril. Kṛṣṇa stood, unharmed and smiling, after the destruction of the demon, surrounded by the cow-herds, who, together with their women, were filled with astonishment at the death of Keśin, and glorified the amiable god with the lotus eyes.

Curious to behold this great combat between a man and a horse–such a one as was never before heard of–I have come from heaven. Wonderful are the works that you hast done, in thy descent upon the earth ! they have excited my astonishment; but this, above all, has given me pleasure. Indra and the gods lived in dread of this horse, who tossed his mane, and neighed, and looked down upon the clouds. For this, that you hast slain the impious Keśin, you shalt be known in the world by the name of, Keśava,[2]

Farewell: I will now depart. I shall meet you again, conqueror of Keśin, in two days more, in conflict with Kaṅsa. When the son of Ugrasena, with his followers, shall have been slain, then, upholder of the earth, will earth's burdens have been lightened by you. Many are the battles of the kings that I have to see, in which you shall be renowned. I will now depart, Govinda. A great deed, and acceptable to the gods, has been done by you. I have been much delighted with you, and now take my leave."

NOTES

1 As Vīrabhadra did to Pūṣī or Pūṣan, a form of Sūrya, at the sacrifice of Dakṣa: see Bk. 1 Ch. VIII. n. 6.

2. Or Keśi and va. 'who kills,' from vadh or badh,'to kill:' but this is a Paurāṇik etymology, and less satisfactory than the usual grammatical one of Keśa, 'hair' and 'va' possessive affix: Kṛṣṇa corresponding in this respect to the Apollo Crinitus. It is also derived from the legend of his origin from 'a hair'(see Bk. V. Ch. X. a. 23): and again, Keśa is said to purport 'radiance' or 'rays.' whether of the sun or moon or fire : all which are the light of Kṛṣ ṇa: whence he is called Keśava, 'the rayed' or 'radiant.' Mahābhārata, Mokṣa Dharma.

3 The legend is told by all the other narrators of Kṛṣṇa's Juvenile exploits.

(अक्रूरस्य गोकुलयात्रा)

Akrūra, having set off in his quick travelling car, proceeded to visit Kṛṣṇa at the pastures of Nanda; and, as he went along, he congratulated himself on his superior good fottune, in having an opportunity of beholding a descended portion of the deity.

"Now," thought he, "has my life borne fruit; my night is followed by the dawn of day; since I shall see the countenance of Viṣṇu, whose eyes are like the expanded leaf of the lotus. I shall behold that lotus eyed aspect of Viṣṇu, which, when seen only in imagination, takes away the sins of men. I shall to-day behold that glory of glories, the mouth of Viṣ ṇu, whence proceeded the Vedas, and all their dependant sciences. I shall see the sovereign of the world, by whom the world is sustained; who is worshipped as the best of males, as the male of sacrifice in sacrificial rites. I shall see Keśava, who it without beginning or end; by worshipping whom with a hundred sacrifices, Indra obtained the sovereignty over the gods.

That Hari, whose nature is unknown to Brahmā, Indra, Rudra, the Aśvins, the Vasus. Ādityas, and Maruts, will this day touch my body. The soul of all, the knower of all, he who is all, and is present in all, he who is permanent, undecaying, all-pervading, will converse with me. He, the unborn, who has preserved the world in the various forms of a fish, a tortoise, a bore, a horse,[1] a lion, will this day speak to me. Now the lord of the earth, who assumes shapes at will, has taken upon him the condition of humanity, to accomplish some object cherished in his heart. That Ananta, who holds the earth upon his crest, and who has descended upon earth for its protection, will this day call me by my name. Glory to that being, whose deceptive adoption of father, son, brother, friend, mother, and relative, the world is unable to penetrate. Glory to him, who is one with true knowledge, who is inscrutable, and through whom, seated in his heart, the Yogi crosses the wide expanse of worldly ignorance and illusion.

I bow to him, who, by the performers of holy rites, is called the male of sacrifice (Yajña-puruṣa): by pious worshippers is termed Vāsudeva; and by the cultivators of philosophy, Viṣṇu. May he in whom cause and effect, and the world itself, is comprehended, be propitious to me, through his truth; for always do I put my trust in that unborn, eternal Hari; by meditation on whom, man becomes the repository of all good things."

His mind thus animated by devout faith, and meditating in this manner, Akrūra proceeded on his road, and arrived at Gokula a little before sunset, at the time of the milking of the cows; and there he saw Kṛṣṇa amongst the cattle, dark as the leaf of the full blown lotus; his eyes of the same colour, and his breast decorated with the, Śrīvatsa mark; long armed, and broad chested; having a high nose, and a lovely countenance, brightened with mirthful smiles; treading firmly on the ground, with feet whose nails were tinted red; clad in yellow garments, and adorned with a garland of forest flowers; having a fresh-gathered creeper in his hand, and a chaplet of white lotus flowers on his head, Akrūra also beheld there Balabhadra, white as a jasmine, a swan, or the moon, and dressed in blue raiment; having large and powerful arms, and a countenance as radiant as a lotus in bloom; like another Kailāsa mountain, crested with a wreath of clouds.

When Akrūra sow these two youths, his countenance expanded with delight, and the down of his body stood erect with pleasure: for this he thought to be supreme happiness and glory; this, the double manifestation of the divine Vāsudeva; this was the twofold gratification of his sight, to behold the creator of the universe: now he hoped that his bodily form would yield fruit, as it would bring him in contact with the person of Kṛṣṇa; and that the wearer of infinite forms would place his hand on his back; the touch of whose finger alone is sufficient to dispel sin, and to secure imperishable felicity: that hand which launches the fierce irresistible discus, blazing with all the flames of fire, lightning, and the sun, and slaughtering the demon host washes the collyrium from the eyes of their brides: that hand into which Bali poured water, and thence obtained ineffable enjoyments below the earth, and immortality and dominion over the gods for a whole Manvantara, without peril from a foe.

"Alas! he will despise me, for my connexion with Kaṅsa, an associate with evil, though not contaminated by it. How vain is his birth, who is shunned by the virtuous? and yet what is there in this world unknown to him who resides in the hearts of all men, who is ever existent, exempt from imperfection, the aggregate of the quality of purity, and identical with true knowledge? With a heart wholly devoted to him, then, I will approach the lord of all lords, the descended portion of Puruṣ oatama, of Viṣṇu, who is without beginning, middle, or end."

NOTES

1. The commentator explains this to mean Hayagrīva, or Viṣṇu with the neck and head of a horse; who, it is said in the second book of the Bhāgavata, appeared at the end of a great sacrifice performed by Brahmā, and breathed from his nostrils the texts of the Vedas. The fourth Avatāra is always elsewhere said to be the Vāmana. or dwarf.

Thus meditating, the Yādava approached Govinda, and addressed him, and said, "I am Akrūra," and bowed his head down to the feet of Hari; bile Kṛṣṇa laid upon him his hand, which was marked with the flag, the thunderbolt, and the lotus, and drew him towards him, and affectionately embraced him.

Then Keśava and Rāma entered into conversation with him, and, having heard from him all that had occurrred, were much pleased, and led him to their habitation: there they resumed their discourse, and gave him food to eat, and treated him with proper hospitality, Akrūra told them how their father Ānakadundubhi, the princess Devakī and even his own father, Ugrasena, had been insulted by the iniquitous, demon Kaṅsa: he also related to them the purpose for which he had been dispatched. When he had told them all these things, the destroyer of Keśin said to him, "I was aware of all that you have told me, lord of liberal gifts:

Rāma and I will go tomorrow to Mathurā along with you. The elders of the cowherds shall accompany us, bearing ample offerings. Rest here to-night, and dismiss all anxiety. Within three nights I will slay Kaṅsa and his adherents."

Having given orders accordingly to the cowherds, Akrūra, with Keśava and Rāma, retired to rest, and slept soundly in the dwelling of Nanda. The next morning was bright, and the youths prepared to depart for Mathurā with Akrūra. The Gopīs, seeing them about to set forth, were much afflicted; they wept bitterly, their bracelets were loose upon their arms, and they thus communed together:

"If Govinda depart for Mathurā, how will he return to Gokula ? His ears will there be regaled with the melodious and polished conversation of the women of the city. Accustomed to the language of the graceful females of Mathurā, he will never again endure the rustic expressions of the Gopīs. Hari, the pride of the station, is carried off, and a fatal blow is inflicted upon us by inexorable destiny. Expressive smiles, soft language, graceful airs, elegant gait, and significant glances, belong to the women of the city, Hari is of rustic breeding, and, captivated by their fascinations, what likelihood is there of his returning to the society of any one amongst us?

Keśava, who has mounted the car to go to Mathurā, has been deceived by the cruel, vile, and desperate Akrūra. Does not the unfeeling traitor know the affection that we all here feel for our Hari, the joy of our eyes, that he is taking him away ? Unkind that he is, Govinda is departing from us, along with Rāma: haste! let us stop him ! Why talk of telling our seniors that we cannot bear his loss? What can they do for us, when we are consumed by the fires of separation? The Gopas, with Nanda at their head, are themselves preparing to depart; no one makes any attempt to detain Govinda, Bright is the morning that succeeds to this night for the women of Mathurā, for the bees of their eyes will feed upon the lotus face of Acyuta.

Happy are they who may go hence without impediment, and behold, enraptured, Kṛṣṇa on his Journey. A great festival will give pleasure to-day to the eyes of the inhabitants of Mathurā, when they see the person of Govinda. What a blissful vision will be seen by the happy women of the city, whose brilliant eyes shall regard, unchecked, the countenance of Kṛṣṇa! Alas! the eyes of the Gopīs have been deprived of sight by the relentless Brahmā, after he had shown them this great treasure. In proportion as the affection of Hari for us decays, so do our limbs wither, and the bracelets slip from our arms : and now the cruel Akrūra urges on the horses: all conspire to treat unhappy females with unkindness. Alas ! alas! we see now only the dust of his chariot wheels! and now he is far away, for even that dust is no longer to be seen!"

Thus lamented by the women, Keśava and Rāma quitted the district of Vraja.[1] Travelling in a car drawn by fleet horses, they arrived at noon at the banks of the Yamunā, when Akrūra requested them to halt a little, whilst he performed the usual daily ceremonial in the river.[2] Accordingly the intelligent Akrūra bathed, and rinsed his mouth, and then entering the stream, he stood meditating upon the supreme being; but he beheld mentally[3] Balabhadra, having thousand hooded heads, a garland of Jasmine flowers, and large red eyes, attended by Vāsuki. Rambhā and other mighty serpents, praised by the Gandharvas decorated with wild flowers, wearing dark coloured garments, crowned with a chaplet of lotuses, ornamented with brilliant earrings, Inebriate, and standing at the bottom of the river in the water.[4] On his lap he also beheld, at his ease, Kṛṣṇa. of the complexion of a cloud,[5] with full and coppery eyes, having an elegant form, and four hands, armed with the discus and other weapons, wearing yellow clothes, decorated with many coloured flowers, and appearing like a cloud embellished with streams of lightning and the bow of Indra; his breast was marked with the celestial sign, his arms were radiant with bracelets, a diadem shone on his brow, and he wore a white lotus for his crest: he was attended by Sanandana and other holy sages, who, fixing then eyes upon the tips of their noses, were absorbed in profound meditation.

When Akrūra beheld Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa in this situation, he was much amazed, and wondered how they could so quickly have got there from the chariot. He wished to ask them this, but Janārddana deprived him of the faculty of speech at the moment. Ascending then from the water, he repaired to the car, and there he found them both quietly seated in the same human persons as before. Plunging again into the water, there he again beheld them, hymned as before by the Gandharvas, saints, sages, and serpents. Apprehending, therefore, their real character, he thus eulogized the eternal deity, who consists of true knowledge :

"Salutation to you, who is uniform and manifold, all-pervading, supreme spirit, of inconceivable glory, and who are simple existence. Salutation to you, O inscrutable, who are truth, and the essence of oblations. Salutation to you, O lord, whose nature is unknown, who is beyond primeval matter, who exist in five forms, as one with the elements, with the faculties, with matter, with the living soul, with supreme spirit. Show favour to me, O soul of the universe, essence of all things, perishable or eternal, whether addressed by the designation of Brahmā, Viṣ ṇu, Śiva, or the like. I adore you, O god, whose nature is indescribable, whose purposes are inscrutable, whose name even is unknown; for the attributes of kind or appellation are not applicable to you, who is THAT[6], the supreme Brahma, eternal, unchangeable, uncreated. But as the accomplishment of our object cannot be attained except through some specific form, you are termed by us Kṛṣṇa, Achyuta, Ananta, or Viṣṇu. You, unborn divinity, are all the objects of thesc impersonations; you are the gods, and all other beings; you are the whole world; you are all. Soul of the universe you are exempt from change, and there is nothing except you in all this existence. You are Brahmā, Paśupati, Aryaman, Dhātrī, and Vidhātrī; you are Indra, air, fire, the regent of the waters, the god of wealth, and judge of the dead; and you, although but one, preside over the world with various energies, addressed to various purposes. You, identical with the solar ray, create the universe; all elementary substance is composed of thy qualities; and thy supreme form is denoted by the imperishable term sat (existence). To him who is one with true knowledge, who is and is not perceptible, I bow. Glory be to him, the lord Vāsudeva, to Śaṅkarṣaṇa, to Pradyumna, and to Aniruddha.[7]

NOTES

1 In the Bhāgavata, Hari Vaṃśa, etc. several adventures of Kṛṣṇa, during his residence at Vraja, are recorded, of which our text makes no mention. Of these, the two most popular are Kṛṣṇa's taking away the clothes of the Gopīs whilst bathing, and his liberating the Gopas from the mouth of Aghāsura, disguished as a vast serpent, into which they had entered, thinking it a cavern in a mountain. The omission of these two legends, or of any of the rest, is not much to be regretted.

2 The noonday prayer; or-Sandhyā.

3 By his Dhyāna, or force of meditation, in which it is attempted to bring before the mind's eye some definite form of the object of adoration, In this case Akrūra is compelled to see a form he did not anticipate. The Hari Vaṃśa very clumsily sets him to meditate upon the serpent Śesha, which spoils the story, intended as that is to exhibit the identity of Balarāma and Kṛṣṇa with the supreme.

4 Balarāma was thus visible in his real character of Śeṣa, the chief of serpents, the couch of Viṣṇu, and supporter or the world.

5 Or rather, he beheld Ghanaśyāma, an appellation of Kṛṣṇa, who is so called from being as black (śyama) as a cloud (ghana).

6 Tad, 'that'; all that is, or that can be conceived.

7 Akrūra's piety is here prophetic; the son and grandson of Kṛṣṇa (see Bk. IV. Ch. XV.) are not yet born:' but this is the Vaiṣṇava style of addressing Kṛṣṇa or Viṣṇu, as identical with four Vyūhas, 'arrangements' or 'dispositions,' Kṛṣṇa, Balarāma, Pradyumna, and Aniruddha, See As. Res. XVI. 35. In this, as in several other places, the Viṣ ṇu PURāṇA differs from some of the other narratives of Kṛṣṇa, by the length and character of the prayers addressed to Viṣṇu. The Hari Vaṃśa, for instance, here has no prayer or panegyric at all: the Bhāgavata inserts one.

एकोनविंशः अध्यायः

Thus the Yādava Akrūra, standing in the river, praised Kṛṣṇa, and worshipped him with imaginary incense and flowers, Disregarding all other objects, he fixed his whole mind upon the deity; and having continued for a long time in spiritual contemplation, he at last desisted from his abstraction, conceiving he had effected the purposes of soul. Coming up from the water of the Yamunā, he went to the car, and there he beheld Rāma, and Kṛṣṇa seated as before. As his looks denoted surprise, Kṛshṇa said to him, "Surely, Akrūra, you have seen some marvel in the stream of the Yamunā, for your eyes are staring as if with astonishment."

Akrūra replied, "The marvel that I have seen in the stream of the Yamunā I behold before me, even here, in a bodily shape; for he whom I have encountered in the water, Kṛṣṇa, is also your wondrous self, of whose illustrious person the whole world is the miraculous developement. But enough of this, let us proceed to Mathurā: I am afraid Kaṅsa will be angry at our delay: such is the wretched consequence of eating the bread of another." Thus speaking, he urged on the quick horses, and they arrived after sunset at Mathurā. When they came in sight of the city, Akrūra said to Kṛṣṇa and Rāma, "You must now journey on foot, whilst I proceed alone in the car; and you must not go to the house of Vāsudeva, for the elder has been banished by Kaṅsa on your account."

Akrūra having thus spoken, left them, and entered the city; whilst Rāma and Kṛṣṇa continued to walk along the royal road. Regarded with pleasure by men and women, they went along sportively, looking like two young elephants. As they roamed about, they saw a washerman colouring clothes, and with smiling countenances they went and threw down some of his fine linen. The washerman was the servant of Kaṅsa, made insolent by his master's favour; and he provoked the two lads with loud and scurrilous abuse, until Kṛṣṇa struck him down, with his head to the ground, and killed him. Then taking the clothes, they went their way, clad in yellow and blue raiment, until they came to a flower-seller's shop. The flower-seller looked at them with astonishment, and wondered who they could be, or whence they could have come. Seeing two youths so lovely, dressed in yellow and blue garments, he imagined them to be divinities descended upon earth. Being addressed by them with mouths budding like lotuses, and asked for some flowers, he placed his hands upon the ground, and touched it with his head, saying, "My lords have shown me great kindness in coming to my house, fortunate that I am; I will pay them homage."

Having thus spoken, the flower-seller, with a smiling aspect, gave them whatever choice-flowers they selected, to conciliate their favour. Repeatedly prostracing himself before them, he presented them with flowers beautiful, fragrant, and fresh. Kṛṣṇa then, being much pleased with him, gave him this blessing; "Fortune, good friend, who depends upon me, shall never forsake you: never shall you suffer loss of vigour, or loss of wealth: as long as time shall last your descendants shall not fail. Having long tasted various delights on earth, you shall finally obtain, by calling me to recollection, a heavenly region, the consequence of my favour. Your heart shall ever be intent on righteousness, and fulness of days shall be the portion of your posterity. Your descendants shall not be subject to natural infirmities, as long as the sun shall endure."

As they proceeded along the high road, they saw coming towards them a young girl, who was crooked, carrying a pot of unguent, Kṛṣṇa addressed her sportively, and said, "For whom are you carrying that unguent? tell me, lovely maiden; tell me truly." Spoken to as it were through affection, Kubjā well disposed towards Hari, replied to him also mirthfully, being smitten by his appearance; "Know you not, beloved, that I am the servant of Kaṅsa, and appointed, crooked as I am, to prepare his perfumes. Unguent ground by any other he does not approve of: hence I am enriched through his liberal rewards."

"Take it," answered Kubjā; and she gave them as much of the unguent as was sufficient for their persons; and they rubbed it on various parts of their faces and bodies,[1] till they looked like two clouds, one white and one black, decorated by the many-tinted bow of Indra. Then Kṛṣṇa, skilled in the curative are, took hold of her, under the chin, with the thumb and two fingers, and lifted up her head, whilst with his feet he pressed down her feet; and in this way he made her straight. When she was thus relieved from her deformity, she was a most beautiful woman; and, filled with gratitude and affection, she took Govinda by the garment, and invited him to her house, Promising to come at some other time, Kṛṣṇa smilingly dismissed her, and then laughed aloud on beholding the countenance of Baladeva.[2] was hung round with garlands: Inquiring of the warders which bow he was to try, and being directed to it, he took it, and bent it; but drawing it with violence, he snapped it in two,[3] and all Mathurā resounded with the noise which its fracture occasioned. Abused by the warders for breaking the bow, Kṛṣṇa and Rāma retorted, and defied them, and left the hall.

"Two youths, cowherd boys, have arrived; you must kill them both, in a trial of,strength, in my presence; for they practise against my life. I shall be well pleased if you kill them in the match, and will give you whatever you wish; not else. These two foes of mine must be killed by you fairly or unfairly. The kingdom shall be ours in common, when they have perished.' Having given them these orders, he sent next for his elephant driver, and desired him to station his great elephant Kuvalayāpīḍa, who was as vast as a cloud charged with rain, near the gate of the arena, and drive him upon the two boys when they should attempt to enter. When Kaṅsa had issued these commands, and ascertained that the platforms were all ready for the spectators, he awaited the rising of the sun, unconscious of impending death.

In the morning the citizens assembled on the platforms set apart for them, and the princes, with the ministers and courtiers, occupied the royal, seats. Near the centre of the circle judges of the games were stationed by Kaṅsa, whilst he himself sat apart close by upon a lofty throne. Separate platforms were erected for the ladies of the palace, for the courtesans, and for the wives of the citizens.[4] Nanda and the cowherds had places appropriated to them, at the end of which sat Akrūra and Vāsudeva. Amongst the wives of the citizens appeared Devakī, mourning for her son, whose lovely face she longed to behold even in the hour of his destruction. When the musical instruments sounded, Cāṇūra sprang forth, and the people cried, "Alas I" and Muṣṭika slapped his arms in defiance. Covered with must and blood from the elephant, whom, when goaded upon them by his driver, they had slain, and armed with his tusks, Balabhadra and Janārddana confidently entered the arena, like two lions amidst a herd of deer.

Exclamations of pity arose from all the spectators, along with expressions of astonishment. "This then," said the people, "is Kṛṣṇa! this is Balabhadra! This is he by whom the fierce night-walker Pūtanā was slain; by whom the waggon was overturned, and the two Arjuna trees felled! This is the boy who trampled and danced on the serpent Kālīya; who upheld the mountain Govarddhana for seven nights; who killed, as if in play, the iniquitous Ariṣṭa, Dhenuka, and Keśin! This whom we see is Acyuta! This is he who has been foretold by the wise, skilled in the sense to the Purāṇas, as Gopala, who shall exalt the the depressed Yādava race! This is a portion of the all-existing, all-generating Viṣṇu, descended upon earth, who will assuredly lighten her load !"

Thus did the citizens describe Rāma and Kṛṣṇa, as soon as they appeared; whilst the breast of Devakī glowed with maternal affection; and Vāsudeva, forgetting his infirmities, felt himself young again, on beholding the countenances to his sons as a season of rejoicing. The women to the palace, and the wives of the citizens, wide opened their eyes, and gazed intently upon Kṛṣṇa. "Look, friends," said they to their companions; "look at the face of Kṛṣṇa; his eyes are reddened by his conflict with the elephant, and the drops to perspiration stand upon his checks, outvieing a full blown lotus in autumn, Studded with glittering dew. Avail yourself now of the faculty of vision. Observe his breast, the seat of splendour, marked with the mystic sign; and his arms, menacing destruction to his foes.

See how he gently smiles at the gestures to Muṣṭika and Cāṇūra, as they spring up. And now behold Hari advance to encounter Cāṇūra. What I are there no elders, judges of the field? How can the delicate form of Hari, only yet in the dawn of adolescence, be regarded as a match for the vast and adamantine bulk of the great demon ? Two youths, of light and elegant persons, are in the arena, to oppose athlelic fiends, headed by the cruel Cāṇūra. This is a great sin in the judges of the games, for the umpires to suffer a contest between boys and strong men."

As thus the women of the city conversed with one another, Hari, having tightened his girdle, danced in the ring, shaking the ground on which he told, Balabhadra also danced, slapping his arms in defiance. Where the ground was firm, the invincible Kṛṣṇa contended foot to foot with Cāṇūra. The practised demon Muṣṭika was opposed by Balabhadra. Mutually entwining, and pushing, and pulling, and beating each other with fists, arms, and elbows, pressing each other with their knees, interlacing their arms, kicking with their feet, pressing with their whole weight upon one another,[5] fought Hari and Cāṇūra. Desperate was the struggle, though without weapons, and one for life and death, to the great gratification of the spectators. In proportion as the contest continued, so Cāṇūra was gradually losing something of his original vigour, and the wreath upon his head trembled from his fury and distress[6]; whilst the world-comprehending Kṛṣṇa wrestled with him as if but in sport. Beholding Cāṇūra losing, and Kṛṣṇa gaining strength, Kaṅsa, furious with rage, commanded the music to cease. As soon as the drums and trumpets were silenced, a numerous band of heavenly instruments was heard in the sky, and the gods invisibly exclaimed, "Victory to Govinda! Keśava, kill the demon Cāṇūra! Madhusūdana having for a long time dallied with his adversary, at last lifted him up, and whirled him round, with the intention of putting an end to him. Having whirled Cāṇūra round a hundred times, until his breath was expended in the air, Kṛṣṇa dashed him on the ground with such violence as to smash his body into a hundred fragments, and strew the earth with a hundred pools of gory mire. Whilst this took place, the mighty Baladeva was engaged in the same manner with the demon bruiser Muṣṭika. Striking him on the head with his fists, and on the breast with his knees, he stretched him on the ground, and pummelled him there till he was dead.

Again, Kṛṣṇa encountered the royal bruiser Tomalaka, and felled him to the earth with a blow to his left hand. When the other athlete saw Chāṇūra, Muṣṭika, and Tomalaka killed, they fied from the field; and Kṛṣṇa and Saṅkarṣaṇa danced victorious on the arena, dragging along with them by force the cowherds of their own age. Kaṅsa, his eyes reddening with wrath, called aloud to the surrounding people, "Drive those two cow" boys out of the assembly: seize the villain Nanda, and secure him with chains of iron: put Vasudeva to death with tortures intolerable to his years: and lay hands upon the cattle, and whatever else belongs to those cowherds who are the associates of Kṛṣṇa."

Upon hearing these orders, the destroyer of Madhu laughed at Kaṅsa, and, springing up to the place where he was seated, laid hold of him by the hair of his head, and struck his tiara to the ground: then casting him down upon the earth, Govinda threw himself upon him. Crushed by the weight of the upholder of the universe, the son of Ugrasena, Kaṅsa the king, gave up the ghost, Kṛṣṇa then dragged the dead body, by the hair of the head, into the centre of the arena, and a deep furrow' was made by the vast and heavy carcass of Kaṅsa, when it was dragged along, the ground by Kṛṣṇa, as if a torrent of water had ran through it[7] Seeing Kaṅsa thus treated, his brother Sumālin came to his succour; but he was encountered, and easily killed, by Balabhadra. Then arose a general cry of grief from the surrounding circle, as they beheld the king of Mathurā thus slain, and treated with such contumely, by Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa, accompanied by Balabhadra, embraced the feet to Vasudeva and of Devakī; but Vasudeva raised him up; and he and Devakī recalling to recollection what he had said to them at his birth, they bowed to Janārddana, and the former thus addressed him:

"Have compassion upon mortals, O god, benefactor and lord of deities: it is by thy favour to us two that you have become the (present) upholder of the world. That, for the punishment of the rebellious, you have descended upon earth in my house, having been propitiated by my prayers, sanctifies our race. You are the heart of all creatures, you abide in all creatures; and all that has been, or will be, emanates from you, O universal spirit! You, Achyuta, who comprehen all the gods, are eternally worshipped with sacrifices: you are sacrifice itself, and the offerer of sacrifices. The affection that inspires my heart and the heart of Devakī towards you, is if you were our child, is indeed but error, and a great delusion.

Have compassion therefore indeed, O supreme lord, and in thy descended portions protect the universe. You are no son of mine. This whole world, from Brahma to a tree, you are. Wherefore do you, who are one with the supreme, beguile us? Blinded by delusion, I thought you my son ; and for you, who are beyond all fear, I dreaded the anger of Kaṅsa, and therefore did I take you in my terror to Gokula, where you have grown up; but I no longer claim you as mine own. You, Viṣṇu, the sovereign lord of all, whose actions Rudra, the Maruts, the Aśvins, Indra, and the gods, cannot equal, although they behold them; you who has come amongst us for 'the benefit of the world, are recognised, and delusion is no more."

NOTES

1 They had their bodies smeared in the style called Bhaktichheda (भक्तिच्छेदानुलिप्ताङ्गौ); that is, with the separating or distinguishing (cheda) marks of Vaiṣṇava devotion (bhakti) : certain streaks on the forehead, nose, cheeks, breast, and arms, which denote a follower of Viṣṇu. See As.Res.XVI.33.

2 The story is similarly told in the Bhāgavata, etc.

3 The bending or breaking of a bow is a favourite incident in Hindu heroic poetry, borrowed, no doubt, from the Rāmāyaṇa, where, however, it has an object: here it is quite gratuitous.

4 The Bhāgavata enters into even fewer particulars than our text of the place set apart for the games. The Hari Vaṃśa gives a much more detailed description, which is in some respects curious. The want of any technical glossary, and the general manner in which technical terms are explained in the ordinary dictionaries, reader it difficult to understand exactly what is intended, and any translation to the passages must be defective. The French version, however, probably represents a much more splendid and threatrical scene-than the text authorizes, and may therefore admit of correction. The general plan is nothing more than an enclosed space, surrounded by temporary structures of timber or bamboos, open or enclosed, and decorated with hangings and garlands. It may be doubted it the details described by the compiler of the Hari Vaṃśa were very familiar even to him; for his description is not always very cosistent or precise. Of two commentators, one evidently knows nothing of what be attempts to explain; but with the assistance of the other the passages may be thus, though not always confidently. rendered:

"The king, Kaṅsa, meditating on these things, went forth from his palace to the place which had been prepared for the sight of the ceremonial (1). to inspect the scaffolds (2). which had been constructed. He found the place close set with the several platforms (3), of the different public bodies (4), strongly put together, and decorated with roofed pavilions of various sizes, supported by colums. and divided into commodious chambers (5). The edifice was extensive, well arranged, secured by strong rafters (6) spacious and lofty, and commodious and secure. Stairs led to the different galleries (7). Chairs to state (8) were placed in various parts of it. The avenues that conducted to it were narrow (9). It was covered with temporary stages and sheds (10), and was capable of sustaining the weight of a multitude.

Having seen the place to the festival thus adorned, Kama gave orders, and said, To-morrow let the platforms and terraces and pavilions (11) be decorated with pictures and garlands and flags and images (12), and let them be scented with fragrant odours, and covered over with awnings (13). Let there be ample heaps of dry, pounded cow-dung (14) provided on the ground, and suitable refreshment chambers be covered over, and decorated with bells and ornamented arches (15). Let large water-jars be securely fixed in order, capable of holding a copious supply, and provided with golden drinking-cups. Let apartments be prepared (16), and various kinds of beverage, in appropriate vessels, be ready. Let judges of the games be invited, and corporations with their chiefs. Let orders be issued to the wrestlers, and notice be given to the spectators; and let platforms for their accommodation be fitted up in the place of assembly' "(17).

When the meeting takes place, the site of the games is thus described: "Upon the following day the amphitheatre (18) was filled by the citizens. anxious to behold the games. The place of assemby(19) was supported by octagonal painted pillars (20), fitted up with terraces and doors and bolts, with windows circular or crescent; shaped, and accommodated with seats with cushions (21). and it shone like the ocean whilst large clouds hang upon it, with spacious, substantial pavilions (22), fitted up for the sight of the combat; open to the front (23). but screend with beautiful and fine curtains (24), crowned with festoons of flowers, and glistening with radiance like autumnal clouds. The pavilions of the different companies and corporations, vast as mountains, were decorated with banners, bearing upon them the implements and emblems of the several crafts (25). The chambers of the inhabitants of the inner apartments shone near at hand, bright with gold and painting and net-work of gems: they were richly decorated with precious stones, were enclosed below with costly hanging, and ornamented above with spires and banners, and looked like mountains spreading their wings in the sky; while the rays of light reflected from the valuable of jewel were blended with the waving of white chowries, and the musical tinkling of female ornaments. The separate pavilions of the courtesans were graced by lovely women, attired in the most splendid dresses (27), and emulated the radiance of the cars of the gods, In the place of assembly there were excellent seats, couches made of gold, and hangings of various colours, intermixed with bunches of flowers: and there were golden vases of water, and handsome places for refreshment, filled with fruits of various kinds, and cooling juices, and sherbets fit for drinking (28). And there were many other stages and platforms, constructed of strong timber, and hangings by hundreds and thousands were displayed: and upon the tops of the houses, chambers fitted up with delicate jalousies, through which the women might behold the sports, appeared like swans flying through the air,

"In front stood the pavilion of Kaṅsa, surpassing all the rest in splendour, looking like mount Meru in radiance; its sides, its columns, being covered with burnished gold : fastened with coloured cords; and every way worthy the presence of a king."

In justification of the rendering of the above, an explanation of the technical terms, taken either from dictionaries or from the commentators, may be subjoined. (1) Kaṅsa went to the Prekṣāgāra (प्रेक्षागारं), literally 'house of seeing;' but it is evident, from its interior being visible to spectators on the tops of the houses, as subsequently mentioned, that it was not a theatre, or covered edifice. If a building at all, it was merely a sort of stockade. One commentator calls it, 'a place made for seeing the sacrifice; धनुर्भहप्रेक्षणार्थं कृतं स्थानं। (2) Mañchānām avalokaka (मञ्चानांमवलोककः). The Mañchī is commonly understood to signify a raised platform, with a floor and a roof, ascended by a ladder: see Dictionary, (3) Mañcha-vāṭa (मञ्चवाटः). Vāta is either 'site' or 'inclosure,' and is used here without much affecting the sense of Mañcha. The compound is explained by the commentators, 'prepared places' (रचितभूमयः), or 'the sites of the platforms' (मञ्चभूमयः). (4) The Śreṇīs (श्रेणीनां), associations of artificers practising the same art. One of the commentaries understands the term to be here used to denote, not their station, but their labours: 'The structure was the work of the artificers' (श्रेणीनां प्रयत्नं). (5) Several words occur here of technical import. The passage is, सोत्रमागा रयुक्ताभिर्वलभीभिर्विभूषितं कुटीभिश्चप्रवृद्धाभिरेक स्तम्भैश्चभूषितं। Valabhi is said by the commentator to mean a structure with a pent roof, supported by six columns, Kutī, a circular one, having seven roofs–something perhaps like a Chinese pagoda–and four columns. The Eka-stambha is a chamber, supported by one column: वलभीभिरुभयतो नमत्पक्षद्वयाभि छदीभिः षत् स्तम्भामिः। कुटीभिश्चप्रवृद्धाभिः कीष्टकैः सप्तछदिकश्चतुस्तम्भैः॥ (6) Sāraniryyūham (सारनिर्य्यूहं)- It is difficult to understand the necessity of rafters in an inclosure in which the platforms and stages seem to have been erected independently of any floor or wall: but the commentary explains Niryyūha, strong brackets, projecting from a house: सारनिर्य्यूहं दृढतागदन्ताः गृहात्निर्गतादारूणि। (7) Aslisṇta susliṣta manchārohanam. The first epithet is explained, 'not contracted' (असंकुचितं); the second, 'well constructed' (साधुरचितं); and for the 'ascending' (Ārohanam) we have सोपानपंक्तिर्यत्र 'where was a line of steps,' or 'ladders'. There is another reading to the text, however, which may be rendered, 'Having steps well secured in their ascent above' (उदक् प्रवणसुश्लिष्टं मञ्चारोहणं). (8) 'Seats for king' (नृपासनानि). (9) Such is the literal purport of Sañcāra-patha-sankulam (संचारपथसंकुलं), implying, possibly, the formation of passages by fences on either side. (10) This is doubtful: the phrase is (छन्नं तद्वेदिकाभिः) Channam-tad-vedikābhi. Channam means, literally, 'covered,' and can scarcely be used in the sense of 'overspread or filled with.' Vedikā means an elevated floor or terrace, with which a halt or edifice cannot well be 'covered ;' and therefore requires the sense here given to Channa. The commentators are silent. (11) The Mancavāṭas and Valabhis, as above : the other term is Vīthi, "a shop.' 'a terrace,' 'a road.' (12) Let them be Vapuṣmanta (वपुष्मन्तः); 'having painted or sculptured figures' (चित्रयुरुषादि युक्ताः). The other commentary render it merely 'pleasant' or 'agreeable' (स्पृहणीयाः). (13) 'Covered above with cloths' (उपनीतोत्तरच्छदाः). The use of the awning or Samiana is very common in India. (14) For the wrestlers to rub over their bodies to absorb the perspiration (मल्लानां स्वेदोन्मार्जनार्थं). (15) This is all rather questionable: the passage is most usually, घण्टास्तोरणशोभाश्च वलयश्चानुरूपतः। Vali or Ball in one sense means 'the edge of a thatch,' and may be put for some sort of temporary structure, a kind of retiring or refreshment room for the boxers and wrestlers. In some copies it is read, पटास्तरणशोभाः 'beautiful with clothes spread,' on which the performers may sit when disengaged ; perhaps a sort of carpet on the ground. (16) The expression is again Vali (वलयश्चोपकल्प्यतां). Another sense of the word is.

offering of viands, or of the remains of a sacrifice, to all beings; but that cannot be its purport here; nor is it ever used in the sense of viands in general. The verb Kalpa or KIrip also usually implies 'making.' (17) Mañcavāta ; 'in the Samāja,' or 'assembly.' (18) Mahārañga (महारङ्ग) 'the great place of the performance.' Rañga is 'acting' or 'representation.' also the place or site of it (19) All the copies consulted, except one, offer an irregularlity of construction, which, although defended by the commentators, is a license scarcely allowable. The epithets of the first verse are all in the plural number; they then occur in the singular, to agree with the only substantive in the description, Samājavāṭa. According to the commentaries, the plural term Mañcās (मंचाः) understood is the substantive to the epithets of the first stanza, and Samājavāṭa the singular to those of the other verses. This awkardness is however avoided by the reading of an old and very good copy, which puts it all in the singular; as, सचित्राष्टाश्रिचरणः सार्गलद्वारवेदिकः सगवाक्षार्द्धचन्द्रश्च सतलोत्तमभूषितः। (20) The expression is Charaṇa, literally 'foot ;' explained by the commentator, Stambha, 'post' or 'pillar.' (21) The reading of most of the copies is Śayanottama (शयनोत्तमः), which may be taken as the sense of Talottama. 'couches or benches with cushions.' (22) Mañcāgārais (मञ्चागारै), 'temporary houses,' (23) Or 'fronting to the east' (प्राङ् मुखैः). (24) Nirmuktais (निर्मुक्तैः): explained by the commentator to mean 'fine threads, "network,' or 'gauze.' through which persons, females especially, may see without being seen. (25) स्वकर्म्मद्र व्ययुक्ताभिः पताकाभिः। (26) 'With ridges and projections' (स सानुप्रगृहाणि). The commentator explains this, 'with flages on the top of them (उपरि देशे सपताकानि). (27) This appears to be intended for an epithet of the women, although Āstaraṇa is not usually applied to dreas: आस्तरणाम्बरै शोभिता वारमुखाभिः। (21) फलावदंशपूर्णाश्च चाङ्गेर्य्यः पानयोजिताः। Phala to course, is 'fruit' Avadanśa is explained in lexicons, 'what is eaten to excite thirst :' one comment gives it, 'what may be sucked,' as tamarinds, and the like. Chāngeri is explained, 'fluids for drinking, made with sorrel, or acid fruits; ' that is, sherbets. (29) उत्तमागारिका or उत्तरागारिका is an epithet of the Prekṣāgāra, or look-out house of the women (स्त्रीणां प्रेक्ष्यगृहाः), situated on the tops of their houses, according to the commentators; गृहोपरि गृहं यत् तदुत्रमागारं तत्रभवाः प्रेक्ष्यगृहाः। an arrangement very compatible with the form of Indian houses, which have flat roofs, commonly enclosed by a trellis work, or jalousie of masonry. It is observable, that in the Viṣṇu Purāṇa, and in the Mahābhārata, on various public occasions, the women take their places on the platforms, or in the pavilions, without curtains or screens.

5 The terms here used are technical, and refer to the established modes of wrestling amongst Hindu athlete. 1. Sannipāta (सन्निपातः) is described 'mutual laying hold of.' 2. Avadūta (अवदूतः), 'letting go of thc adversary.' 3. Kṣepaṇa (क्षेपणं), 'pulling to, and casting back.' 4. Muṣṭinipāta (मुष्टिनिपातः), 'striking with fists.' 5. Kīlanipāta (कीलनिपातः), 'striking with the elbow.' 6. Vajranipāta (वज्रनिपातः), 'striking with the fore-arm.' 7. Jānunirghāta (जानुनिर्घातः), 'pressing or 'striking with the knees.' 8. Bāhuvighaṭṭana (बाहुविघट्टनं), "interlacing the arms.' 9. Pādoddhūta (पादोद्धूत), 'kicking.' 10. Prasṛshṭā (प्रमृष्टा) 'intertwining of the whole body.' In some copies another term occurs, Aśmaoirghāta (अश्मनिर्घातः). 'striking with stones,' or, striking blows as hard as with stones;' for stones could scarcely be used in a contest specified as 'onc without weapons' (अशस्त्रं युद्धं)

6 Kṛṣṇa contended with Chāṇūra, 'who through distress and anger shook the flowers of his crest; खेदाच्चालयता कोपात्रिजशेखकेशरं। The two last terms are explained. 'the flower of the wreath on his head:' स्वशीर्षापीडभूत पुष्पं।

7. Et latus median sulcus diducit arenam. 'The yielding sand being furrowed into a ditch or water-course, by the dead bodies being dragged over it. The text is गौरवेणातिमहता परिखा तेन कृष्यता। कृता कंसस्य देहेन वेगेनेव महाम्भसः॥

Having permitted to Devakī and Vasudeva an interval of true knowledge, through the contemplation of his actions, Hari again spread the delusions of his power over them and the tribe of Yadu. He said to them, "Mother; venerable father; you have both been long observed by Saṅkarṣaṇa and myself with sorrow, and in fear of Kaṅsa. He whose time passes not in respect to his father and mother, is a vile being, who descends in vain from virtuous parents. The lives of those produce good fruit, who reverence their parents, their spiritual guides, the Brāhmaṇas, and the gods. Pardon therefore, father, the impropriety of which we may have been culpable, in resenting without your orders, to which we acknowledge that we are subject, the oppression we suffered from the power and violence of Kaṅsa."

Thus speaking, they offered homage to the elders of the Yadu tribe in order, and then in a suitable manner paid their respects to the citizens. The wives of Kaṅsa, and those of his father, then surrounded the body to the king, lying on the ground, and bewailed his fate in deep affliction, Hari in various ways expressed his regret for what had chanced, and endeavoured to console them, his own eyes being suffused with tears. The foe of Madhu then liberated Ugrasena from confinement, and placed him on the throne, which the death of his son had left vacant. The chief of the Yādavas, being crowned, performed the funeral rites of Kaṅsa, and of the rest of the slain. When the ceremony was over, and Ugrasena had resumed his royal seat, Kṛṣṇa addressed him, and said, "Sovereign lord, command boldly what clse is to be done. The curse of Yayāti has pronounced our race unworthy of dominion:[1] but with me, for your servant, you may issue your orders to the gods. How should kings disobey them? "

Accordingly Vāyu went, and delivered the message to the hushand of Śacī, who immediately gave up to him the hall Sudharman, and Vāyu conveyed it to the Yādavas, the chiefs of whom thenceforth possessed this celestial court, emblazoned with jewels, and defended by the arm of Govinda. The two excellent Yadu youths, versed in all knowledge, and possessed of all wisdom, then submitted to instruction, as the disciples of teacher.

Accocdingly they repaired to Śāndīpanī–who, though born in Kāśī, resided at Avanti–to study the science of arms, and, becoming his pupils, were obedient and attentive to their master, exhibiting an example to all men of the observance of instituted rules. In the course to sixty-four days they had gone through the elements to military science, with the treatises on the use of arms, and directions for the mystic incantacions, which secure the aid of supernatural weapons,[2] Sāndīpani, astonished at such proficiency, and knowing that it exceeded human faculties, imagined that the sun and moon had become his scholars. When they had acquired all that he could teach, they said to him, "Now say what present shall be given to you, as the preceptor's fee." The prudent Sāndīpani, perceiving that they were endowed with more then mortal powers, requested them to give him his dead son, drowned in the sea of Prabhāsa.[3] Taking up their arms, they marched against the ocean; but the all-comprehending sea said to them, " I have not killed the son of Sāndīpani; a demon named Panchajana, who lives in the form of a conch shell, seized the boy: he is still under my waters.

On hearing this, Kṛṣṇa plunged into the sea; and having slain the vile Panchajana, he took the conch shell, which was formed of his bones (and bore it as his horn), the sound of which fills the demon hosts with dismay, animates the vigour of the gods, and annihilates unrighteousness. The heroes also recovered the boy from the pains of death, and restored him in his former person to his father, Rāma and Janārddana then returned to Mathurā, which was well presided over by Ugrasena, and abounded in a happy population both of men and women.[4]

Parāśara said– The mighty Kaṅsa had married the two daughters of Jarāsandha, one named Astī, the other Prāptī, Jarāsandha was king of Magadha, and a very 'powerful prince;[1] who, when he heard that Kṛṣṇa had killed his son-in-law, was much incensed, and, callecting a large force, marched against Mathurā determined to put the Yādavas and kṛṣṇa to the sword. Accordingly he invested the city with three and twenty numerous divisions of his forces[2] Rāma and Janārddana sallied from the town with a slender, but resolute force, and fought bravely with the armies of Magadha. The two youthful leaders prudently resolved to have recourse to their ancient weapons, and accordingly the bow of Hari, with two quivers filled with exhaustless arrows, and the mace called Kaumodaki, and the ploughshare of Balabhadra, as well as the club Saunanda, descended at a wish from heaven. Armed with these weapons, they speedily discomfited the king of Magadha and his hosts, and re-encered the city in triumph.

Although the wicked king of Magadha, Jarāsandha, was defeated, yet Kṛṣṇa knew that whilst he escaped alive he was not subdued, and in, fact he soon returned with a mighty force, and was again forced by Rāma and Kṛṣṇa to fly, Eighteen times[3] did the haughty prince of Magadha renew his attack upon the Yādavas, headed by Kṛṣṇa; and was as often defeated and put to the rout by them, with very inferior numbers.

That the Yādavas were not overpowered by their foes, was owing to the present might of the portion of the discusarmed Viṣṇu. It was the pastime of the lord of the universe, in his capacity of man, to launch various weapons against his enemies; for what effort of power to annihilate his foes could be necessary to him, whose fiat creates and destroys the world? but as subjecting himself to human customs, he formed alliances with the brave, and engaged in hostilities with the base. He had recourse to the four devices of policy, or negotiation, presents, sowing dissension, and chastisement; and sometimes even betook himself to flight. Thus imitating the conduct of human beings, the lord of the world pursued at will his sports.

2 With twenty-three Akṣouhiṇis, each consisting of 109,300 infantry. 65,610 horse, 21,870 chariots, and as many elephants. The Hari Vaṃśa enumerates, as the allies or tributaries of Jarāsandha, a number of princes from various parts of India, but this is a gratuitous embellishment.

3. The Bhāgavata and Hari Vaṃśa say 'seventeen times.' The latter indulges in a prolix description of the first encounter; nothing of which occurs in the Bhāgavata, any more than in our text.

त्रयोविंशोऽध्यायः

Parāśara–Śyāla having called Gārgya the Brahman, whilst at the cow-pens, impotent, in an assembly of the Yādavas, they all laughed; at which he was highly offended, and repaired to the shores of the western sea, where be engaged in arduous penance to obtain a son, who should be terror to the tribe of Yadu. Propitiating Mahādeva, and living upon iron sand for twelve years, the deity at last was pleased with him, and gave him the desired boon. The king of the Yavanas, who was childless, became the friend of Gārgya; and the latter begot a son by his wife, who was as black as a bee, and was thence called Kālayavana[1].

The Yavana king having placed his son, whose breast was as hard as the point of the thunderbolt, upon the throne, retired to the woods. Inflated with conceit of his prowess, Kālayavana demanded of Nārada who were the most mighty heroes on earth. To which the sage answered, "The Yādavas." Accordingly Kālayavana assembled many myriads of Mlecchas and barbarians[2], and with a vast armamcnt of elephants, cavalry, chariot, and foot, advanced impatiently against Mathurā and the'Yādavas, wearying every day the animals that carried him, but insensible of fatigue himself.

When Kṛṣṇa knew of his approach, he reflected that if the Yādavas encountered the Yavana, they would be so much weakened by the conflict, that they would then be overcome by the king of Magadha; that their force was much reduced by the war with Magadha, whilst that of Kālayavana was unbroken, and that the enemy might be therefore victorious. Thus the Yādavas were exposed to a double danger. He resolved therefore to construct a citadel for the Yadu tribe, that should not be easily taken; one 'that even women might defend, and in which therefore the heroes of the house of Vriṣṇi should be secure; one in which the male combatants of the Yādavas should dread no peril, though he himself should be drunk or careless, asleep or abroad, 'thus reflecting, Kṛṣṇa solicited a space of twelve furlongs from the ocean, and there he built the city of Dwārakā[3], defended by high ramparts, and beautified with gardens and reservoirs of water, crowded with houses and buildings, and splendid as the capital of lndra, Amarāvatī. Thither Janārddana conducted the inhabitants of Mathurā, and then awaited at that city the approach of Kālayavana.

When the hostile army encamped round Mathurā Kṛṣṇa unarmed went forth, and beheld the Yavana king, Kālayavana, the strong-armed, recognizing Vāsudeva, pursued him; him whom the thoughts of perfect ascetics connot overtake. Thus pursued, Kṛṣṇa entered a large cavern, where Mucukunda, the king of men, was asleep. The rash Yavana entering the cave, and beholding a man lying asleep there, concluded it must be Kṛṣṇa and kicked him; at which Mucukunda awoke, and casting on him an angry glance, the Yavana was instantly consumed, and reduced to ashes. For in a battle between the gods and demons, Mucukunda had formerly contributed to the defeat of the latter; and, being overcome with sleep, he solicited of the gods as a boon that he should enjoy a long repose. "Sleep long and soundly," said the gods; "and whoever disturbs you shall be instantly burnt to ashes by fire emanating from your body[4]."

Having burnt up the iniquitous Yavana, and beholding the foe of Madhu, Mucukunda asked him who he was, I am born," he replied, "in the lunar race, in the tribe of Yadu, and am the son of Vāsudeva." Muchukuda, recollecting the prophecy of old Garga fell down before the lord of all, Hari, saying, "You are known, supreme lord, to be a portion of Viṣṇu; for it was said of old by Garga, that at the end of the twenty-eighth Dwāpara age Hari would be born in the family of Yadu. You are he, without doubt, the benefactor of mankind; for thy glory I am unable to endure. Thy words are of deeper tone than the muttering of the rain cloud; and earth sinks down beneath the pressure of thy feet. Who without adoring you, who are the origin of all worlds, shall attain, O supreme deity, that rest which endures for ever .? Beguiled by thy delusions, and ignorant of thy nature, men. after suffering the various penalties of birth, death and infirmity, behold the countenance of the king of ghosts, and suffer in hell dreadful tortures, the reward of their own deeds. Addicted to sensual objects, through thy delusions I revolve in the whirpool of selfishness and pride; and hence I come to you, as my final refuge, who are the lord deserving of all homage, than whom there is no other asylum; my mind afflicted with repentance for my trust in the world, and desiring the fulness of fclicity, emancipation from all existence."

NOTES

1. This legend of the origin of Kālayavana is given also by the Hari Vaṃśa. The Bhāgavata, like our text, comes at once to the siege of Mathurā by this chief; but the Hari Vaṃśa suspendeds the story, for more than thirty chapters, to narrate an origin of the Yādavas, and sundry adventures of Kṛṣṇa and Rāma to the south-west. Most of these have no other authority, and are no doubt inventions of the Dakhini compiler; and the others are misplaced.

2. So the Bhāgavata describes him as leading a host of Mlecchas, or barbariam, againct Kṛṣṇa: but in the Mahābhārta, Sabhā Parvan, where Kṛṣṇa deaeribes the power of Jarāsandha, he admits that he and the Yādavas fled from Mathurā to the west, through fear of that king, but no account is given of any siege of Mathurā, by Kālayavana. The only indication of such a person is the mention that Bhagadatta, the Yavana king, 'who rules over Muru and Naraka in the west and south, is one of his most attached feudatories. This king is in various other places called king to Prāgjyotish, as he is in a subsequent passage of the same book, Sabhā P.; and this name is always applied to the west of Assam. His subjects are, however, still Yavanas and Mlecchas, and he presents horses, caps set with jewels, and swords with ivory hilts", articles scarcely to be found in Assam, which cannot well be the seat of his sovereignty. It seems most likely therefore that the story may have originated in some knowledge of the power and position of the Greek-Bactrian princes, or their Scythian successors, although in the latter compilations it has been mixed up with allusions to the first Mohammedan aggressians. See As, Res. V. 306. and XV 100.

3. According to the Mahābhārata, he only enlarged and fortified the ancient city of Kuśasthalī, founded by Raivata, Sabbā P.: see also Bk. IV. Ch. I of our text.

4. The name of Mucukunda, as one of the sons of Maṇḍhātri occurs io Bk. IV. Ch. II.; but no further notice is taken of him. The Bhāgavata specifies his being the son of that King, and relates the same story of his long sleep as the text The same occurs in the Hari Vaṃśa. The general character of the legends in this chapter is that of reference to something familiar, rather than its narration, In the Hari Vaṃśa the opposite extreme is observable, and there the legends are as prolix as here they are concise. The Bhāgavata follows a middle course; but it seems unlikely that in either of the three we have the original fables.

Thus praised by the wise Mucukunda, the sovereign of all things, the eternal lord, Hari, said to him, "Go to whatever celestial regions you wish, lord of men, possessed of might irresistible, honoured by my favour. When you have fully enjoyed all heavenly pleasures, you shall be born in a distinguished family, retaining the recollection to your former births; and you shall finally obtain emancipation."

The king therefore departed to Gandhamādana, the shrine of Naranārāyaṇa, to perform penance.

Kṛṣṇa having by this stratagem destroyed his enemy, returned to Mathurā, and took captive his army, rich in horses, elephants and cars, which he conducted to Dvārakā, and delivered to Ugrasena, and the Yadu race was relieved from all fear of invasion. Baladeva, when hostilities had entirely ceased, being desirous of seeing his kinsmen. went to Nanda's cow-pens, and there again conversed with the herdsmen and their females, with affection and respect. By some, the elders, he was embraced; others, the juniors, he embraced and with those of his own age, male or female, he talked and laughed. The cow herds made many kind speeches to Halayudha; but some of the Gopīs spoke to him with the affectation of anger, or with feelings of jealousy, as they inquired after the loves of Kṛṣṇa with the women of Mathurā. "Is all well with the fickle and inconstant Kṛṣṇa ?" said they: "Does the volatile swain, the friend of an instant, amuse the women of the city by laughing at our rustic efforts (to please him)? Does he ever think of us, singing in chorus to his songs ? Will he not come here once again to see his mother ? But why talk of these things? it is a different tale to tell for him without us, and for us without him.

So saying, the Gopīs, whose minds were fixed on Kṛṣṇa, addressed Rāma in his place, calling him Dāmodara and Govinda, and laughed and were merry; and Rāma consoled them by communicating to them agreeable, modest, affectionate, and gentle messages from Kṛṣṇa, With the cowherds he talked mirthfully, as he had been wont to do, and rambled along with them over the lands of Vraja.[1]

NOTES

1. This visit of Balarāma to Vraja is placed by the Hari Vaṃśa anterior to the fall of Mathurā; by the Bhāgavata, long subsequent to the establishment of the Yadus at Dvārakā.

Whilst the mighty Śeṣa[1] the upholder of the globe, was thus engaged in wandering amidst the forests with the herdsmen, in the disguise of a mortal–having rendered great services to earth, and still considering what more was to be achieved–Varuṇa, in order to provide for his recreation, said to his wife Vāruṇī (the goddess of wine). You. Madirā, are ever acceptable to the powerful Ananta; go therefore, auspicious and kind goddess, and promote his enjoyments." Obeying these commands, Vāruṇī went and established herself in the hollow of a Kadamba tree in the woods of Vṛndāvana, Baladeva, roaming about, came there, and smelling the pleasant fragrance of liquor, resumed his ancient passion for strong drink. The holder of the ploughshare observing the vinous drops distilling from the Kadamba tree, was much delighted, and gathered and quaffed them[2] along with the herdsmen and the Gopīs, whilst those who were skilful with voice and lute celebrated him in their songs. Being inebriated with the wine, and the drops of perspiration standing like pearls upon his limbs, he called out, not knowing what he said, "Come hither, Yamunā river, I want to bathe." The river, disregarding the words to a drunken man, came not at his bidding: on which Rāma in a rage took up his ploughshare, which he plunged into her bank, and dragged her to him, calling out, "Will you not come, You jade? Will you not come? Now go where you please (if you can)." Thus saying, he compelled the dark river to quit its ordinary course, and follow him whithersoever he wandered through the wood.

At last, however, appeased by her reiterated prayers, he let her go after she had watered all the country.[3] When he had bathed, the goddess of beauty Lakṣmī, came and gave him a beautiful lotus to place in one car, and an earring for the other; a fresh necklace of lotus flowers, sent byVaruṇa; and garments of a dark blue colour, as costly as the wealth of the ocean; and thus decorated with a lotus in one ear, a ring in the other, dressed in blue garments, and wearing a garland, Balarāma appeared united with loveliness.

NOTES

1 The great serpent, of whom Balarāma is an incarnation.

2 There is no vinous exudation from the Kadamba tree (Nauclea Kadamba), but its flowers are said to yield a spirit by distillation ; whence Kādambarī is one the synonyms of wine, or spiritous liqour. The grammarians, however, also derive the word from some legend, stating it to be so called because it was praduced from the hollow of a Kadamba tree on the Gomantha mountain: गोमन्थपर्व्वते कदम्बकोटराज्जाता। The Hari Vaṃśa. which alone makes the Gomantha mountain the scene of an exploit of Kṛṣṇa and Rāma, makes no mention of this origin of wine; and the Bhāgavata merely says that Vāruṇī took up her abode in the hollow of a tree. There must be some other authority therefore for this story.

3 The Bhāgavata and Hari Vaṁṣa repeat this story; the latter very imperfectly : the former adds, that the Yamunā is still to be seen following the course along which she was dragged by Balarāma. The legend probably alludes to the construction of canals from the Jumna, for the purposes of irrigation; and the works of the Mohammedans in this way, which are well known, were no doubt preceded by similar canals dug by order of Hindu princes. 4 See Bk. IV. Ch. XIV.

Bhīṣmaka was king of Vidarbha, residing at Kuṇḍina.[1] He had a son named Rukmin, and a beautiful daughter named Rukmiṇī, Kṛṣṇa fell in love with the latter, and solicited her in marriage; but her brother who hated Kṛṣṇa, would not assent to the espousals. At the suggestion to Jarāsandha, and with the concurrence of his son, the powerful sovereign Bhīṣmaka affianced Rukmiṇī to Śiśupāla. In order to celebrate the nuptials, Jarāsandha and other princes, the friends of Śiśupāla, assembled in the capital of Vidarbha; and Kṛṣṇa, attended by Balabhadra and many other Yādavas, also went to Kuṇḍina to witness the wedding. When there, Hari contrived, on the eve of the unptials, to carry off the princess,[2] leaving Rāma and his kinsmen to sustain the weight of his enemies. Pauṇḍraka, the illustrious Dantavakra, Viduratha, Śiśupāla, Jarāsandha, Śalya, and other kings, indignant at the insult, exerted themselves to kill Kṛṣṇa, but were repelled by Balarāma and the Yédavas.

Rukmin, vowing that he would never enter Kuṇḍina again until he had slain Keśava in fight, pursued and overtook him, In the combat that ensued, Kṛṣṇa destroyed with his discus, as if in sport, the host to Rukmin, with all its horse, and elephants, and foot, and chariots, and overthrew him, and hurled him on the ground, and would have put him to death, but was withheld by the entreaties to Rukmiṇī. "He is my only brother," she exclaimed, "and must not be slain by you: restrain your wrath, O divinc lord, and give me my brother in charity."

Thus addressed by her, Kṛṣṇa, whom no acts affect, spared Rukmin;[3] and he (in pursuance of his vow) founded the city Bhojakaṭa,[4] and ever afterwards dwelt therein. After the defeat of Rukmin, Kṛṣṇa married Rukmiṇī in due form, having first made her his own by the Rākshasa ritual.[5] She bore him the gallant Pradyumna, a portion of the deity of love. The demon Sambara carried him off, but he slew the demon.

NOTES

1 Vidarbha is the country of Berar, and the name remains in the present city of Bedar: the capital however, Kuṇḍinapur, is commonly identified with a place called Kuṇḍapur about forty miles north-east to Amarāvatī (in Berar).

2 When she had gone forth from the city to wordship Ambikā: Bhāgavata. Indrāṇī. the wife of Indra: Hari Vaṃśa. Our text tells the circumstance more concisely than the others.

3 After depriving him of his eyebrows and hair. In the Bhāgavata, Balarāma also interferes in favour of Rukmin, and reproves Kṛṣṇa for disfiguring him.

4 Of course this was somewhere in the neighbourhood of Kuṇḍina or Vidarbha, and usually supposed to be situated on the Narmadā.

5 That is, by violence: thus Manu: "The seizure of a maiden by force, whilst she weeps and calls for assistance, after her kinsmen and friends have been slain in battle, or wounded, and their houses broken open, is the marriage called Rākṣasa." III. 33. According to the Bhāgavata, Rukmiṇī sends to invite Kṛṣṇa to carry her off, and instruct him how to proceed.

Parāśara replied–When Pradyumna was but six days old, he was stolen from the lying-in chamber by Sambara, terrible as death; for the demon foreknew that Pradyumna, if he lived, would be his destroyer. Taking away the boy, Sambara cast him into the ocean, swarming with monsters, into a whirlpool of roaring waves, the haunt of the huge creatures of the deep. A large fish swallowed the child, but he died not, and was born anew from its belly:[1] for that fish, with others, was caught by the fishermen, and delivered by them to the great Asura Sambara.

His wife Māyādevī, the mistress of his household, superintended the operations of the cooks, and saw, when the fish was cut open, a beautiful child, looking like a new shoot of the blighted tree of love. Whilst wondering who this should be, and how be could have got into the belly of the fish, Nārada came to satisfy her curiosity, and said to the graceful dame, "This is the son of him by whom the whole world is created and destroyed, the son of Viṣ ṇu, who was stolen by Sambara from the lying-in chamber, and tossed by him into the sea, where he was swallowed by the fish. He is now in thy power; do you, beautiful woman, tenderly rear this jewel of mankind."

Thus counselled by Nārada, Māyādevī took charge of the boy, and carefully reared him from childhood, being fascinated by the beauty of his person. Her affection became still more impassioned when he was decorated with the bloom of adolescence. The gracefully-moving Māyavatī then, fixing her heart and eyes upon the high-minded Pradyumna, gave him, whom she regarded as herself, all her magic (and illusive) powers.

When the valiant Pradyumna heard this, he was filled with wrath, and defied Sambara to battle. In the conflict that ensued, the son of Mādhava slew the whole host of Sambara. Seven times, he foiled the delusions of the enchanter, and making himself master of the eighth, turned it against Sambara, and killed him. By the same faculty he aseended into the air, and proceeded to his father's house, where he alighted, along with Māyavatī, in the inner apartments. When the women beheld Pradyumna, they thought it was Kṛṣṇa himself:. Rukmiṇī, her eyes dimmed with tears, spoke tenderly to him, and said, "Happy is she who has a son like this, in the bloom of youth. Such would be the age of my son Pradyumna, if he was alive. इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे पञ्चमांशे सप्तविंश: अध्याय:।

At this moment Kṛṣṇa, accompanied by Nārada, arrived; and the latter said to the delighted Rukmiṇī, "This is your own son, who has come hither after killing Sambara, by whom, when an infant, he was stolen from the lying-in ehamber. This is the virtuous Māyāvatī, his wife, and not the wife of Sambara. Hear the reason. When Manmatha, the deity of love, had perished,[2] the goddess of beauty, desirous to seeure his revival, assumed a delusive form, and by her eharms faseinated the demon Sambara, and exhibited herself to him in various illusory enjoyments. This thy son is the descended Kāma; and this is the goddess Ratī, his wife.[3] There is no oeeasion for any uncertainty: this is thy daughter-in-law." Then Rukmiṇī was glad, and Keśava also; the whole city resounded with exclamations of joy, and all the people of Dvārakā were surprised at Rukmiṇī's recovering a son who had so long been lost.

NOTES

1 The Bhāgavata tells the story in the same manner, but the Hari Vaṃśa omits the part of the fish.

2 When he was reduced to ashes by a fiery glance from Śiva, in resentment of his inflaming him with passion for Umā. This legend is a favourite with the Śaiva Purāṇas, and is told in the Liṅga and Kālikā, also in the Padma Purāṇa. and Kaśī Khaṇḍa of the Skānda PURāṇA They do not say much about his resuscitation however; Śiva, in pity of Ratī's grief. restoring him only to a bodiless existence as Anañga, whose place is to be in the hearts of men. The Liṅga adds, that when Viṣṇu, in consequence of the curse of Bhṛgu, shall be born as the son of Vasudeva, Kāma shall be born as one of his sons.

3 The daughter of Dakṣa, but not enumerated amongst those formerly specified (Bk. I. Ch. VII.): she was born from his perspiration, according to the Kālika PURāṇA

Rukmiṇī bore to Kṛṣṇa these other sons, Chārudeṣṇa, Sudeṣṇa, Chārndeha, Suṣeṇa, Chārugupta, Bhadrachāru, Charuvinda, Suchāru, and the very mighty Chāru; also one daughter, Chārumatī. Kṛṣṇa had seven other beautiful wives, Kālindī, Mitravṛndā, the virtuous Nāgnajiti, the queen Jāmbavanti; Rohinī of beautiful form; the amiable and excellent daughter of the king of Madra, Mādrī; Satyabhāmā, the daughter of Śatrujit: and Lakṣmaṇā, of lovely smiles[1]. Besides these, he had sixteen thousand other wives[2].

The heroic Pradyumna was chosen for her lord, at her public choice of a hushand, by the daughter of Rukmin; and he had by her the powerful and gallant prince Aniruddha, who was fierce in fight, an ocean of prowess, and the tamer of his foes. Keśava demanded in marriage for him the granddaughter of Rukmin; and although the latter was inimical to Kṛṣṇa, he betrothed the maiden (who was his son's daughter) to the son of his own daugher (her cousin Aniruddha). Upon the occasion of the nuptials Rāma and other Yādavas attended Kṛṣṇa to Bhojakaṭa, the city of Rukmin.

After the wedding had been solemnized, several of the kings, headed by him of Kaliṅga, said to Rukmin, "This wielder of the ploughshare is ignorant of the dice, which may be convertcd into his misfortune: why may we not contend with him, and beat him, in play?"

The potent Rukmin replied to them, and said, "So let it be:' and he engaged Balarāma at a game of dice in the palace,: Balarāma soon lost to Rukmin a thousand Niṣkas[3]: he then staked and lost another thousand; and then pledged ten thousand, which Rukmin, who was well skilled in gambling, also won. At this the king of Kaliṅga laughed aloud, and the weak and exulting Rukmin grinned, and said, "Baladeva is losing, for he knows nothing of the game; although, blinded by a vain passion for play, he thinks he understands the dice." Halayudha, galled by the broad laughter of the Kaliṅga prince, and the eontemptuous speech of Rukmin, was exceedingly angry, and, overcome with passion, increased his stake to ten millions of Niṣkas. Rukmin accepted the challenge, and therefore threw the dice. Baladeva won, and cried aloud, "The stake is mine." But Rukmin called out as loudly, that he was the winner.

त्वयोक्तोऽयं ग्लहः सत्यं न ममैषोऽनुमोदितः।

"Tell no lies, Bala," said he:"the stake is yours; that is true; but I did not agree to it: although this be won by you, yet still I am the winner."

A deep voice was then heard in the sky, inflaming still more the anger of the high-spirited Baladeva, saying, "Bala has rightly won the whole sum, and Rukmin speaks falsely: although be did not accept the pledge in words, he did so by his acts (having cast the dice)." Balarāma thus excited, his eyes red with rage, started up, and struck Rukmin with the board on which the game was played, and killed him[4]. Taking hold of the trembling king of Kaliṅga, he knocked out the tecth which he had shown when he laughed. Laying hold of a golden column, he dragged it from its place, and used it as a weapon to kill those princes who had taken part with his adversaries.

Upon which the whole circle, crying out with terror, took to fight, and escaped from the wrath of Baladeva. When Kṛṣṇa heard that Rukmin had been kilted by his brother, he made no remark, being afraid to Rukmiṇī on the one hand, and of Bala on the other; but taking with him the newly wedded Aniruddha, and the Yādava tribe, he returned to Dvārakā.

NOTES

1 The number specified, however, both in this place and in c. 32, is nine, instead of eight. The commentator endeavours to explain the difference by identifying Rohiṇī with Jāmbavatī: but in the notices of Kṛṣṇa's posterity, both in this work and in the Bhāgavata. she is distinct from Jāmbavatī.

She seems, however, to be an addition to the more usually specified eight, of whose several marriages the Bhāgavata gives the best account. In addition to the three first respecting whom particulars are found in all, Kālindī, or the Yamunā, is the daughter of the sun, whom Kṛṣṇa meets on one of his visits to Indraprastha, and who claims him as the reward of her penance. His next wife. Mitravindā, is the daughter of his maternal aunt Rājādhidevī (Bk. IV. Ch. XIV.). and sister of Vinda and Anuvinda, kings of Avantī: she chooses him at her Svayamvara. The Hari Vaṁśa calls her Saudattā, daughter of Śivi; and she is subsequently termed Śaivyā by our text. Nāgnajitī or Satyā, the next wife, was the daughter of Nagnajit, king of Kauśala, and was the prize of Kṛṣṇa's overcoming seven fierce bulls, whom no other hero had encountered with success, Bhadrā, princess of Kekaya, alsto Kṛṣṇa's cousin, the daughter of Śrutakirtti (Bk. IV. Ch. XV.), was his next: and his eighth wife was Mādrī, the daughter of the king of Madra; named, according to the Bhāgavata, Lakṣ aṇā; and to the Hari V., Saubhīmā; distinguishing, as does our text, clearly Lakṣmaṇa from Mādri. and like it having no satisfactory equivalent for Bhadrā. The Hari Vaṃśa does not name Rohiṇī, but specifies other names, as Vṛhatī etc. In the life of Kṛṣṇa, taken from the Bhāgavata through a Persian translation, published by Maurice, there is a curious instance of the barbarous distortion of Sanskrit names by the joint labours of the English and Persian translators: the wives of Kṛṣṇa are written. Rokemenee (Rukmiṇī), Seteebhavani (Satyabhāmā), Jamoometee (Jāṃbavati), Kalenderee (Kālindi), Lechmeena (Lakṣmaṇā), Soeta (Satyā?), Bhedravatee (Bhadrā). Mihrbeoda (Mitravinda).

2 These, according to the Mahābhārata. Ādi P,, were Apsarasas, or nymphs. In the Dāna Dharma they become Kṛṣṇa's wives through a boon given him by Umā.

3 The Niṣka is a weight of gold, but according to different authorities of very different amount. The commentator here terms it a weight of four Suvarṇas, each about 175 grains troy.

4 The Bhāgavata and Hari Vaṃśa, which both tell this story, agree in the death of Rukmin; but in the Mahābhārata he appears in the war, on the side of the Paṇḍavas. The occurrence is a not very favourable picture of courtly manners; but scenes of violence have never been infrequent at the courts of Rajput princes.

Śakra, the lord of the three worlds, came mounted on his fierce elephant Airāvata to visit Śauri (Kṛṣṇa) ac Dvārakā. Having entered the city, and been welcomed by Hari, he related to the hero the deeds of the demon Naraka. "By you, Madhusūdana, lord of the gods," said Indra, "in a mortal condition, all sufferings have been soothed. Ariṣta. Dhenuka, Chāṇūra, Muṣṭika, Keśin, who sought to injure helpless man, have all been slain by you, Kaṅsa, Kuvalayāpīda, the child-destroying Putanā, have been killed by you; and so have other oppressors to the world. By you valour and wisdom the three worlds have been preserved, and the gods, obtaining their share of the sacrifices offered by the devout, enjoy satisfaction. But now hear the occasion on which I have come to you, and which you are able to remedy. The son of the earth,[1] called Naraka, who rules over the city of Prāgjyotiṣa,[2] inflicts a great injury upon all creatures. Carrying off the maidens of gods, saints, demons, and kings, he shuts them up in his own palace. He has taken away the umbrella of Varuṇa, impermeable to water, the jewel mountain crest of Mandara, and the celestial nectar-dropping earings of my mother Aditi; and he now demands my elephant Airāvata. I have thus explained to you, Govinda, the tyranny of the Asura; you can best determine now it is to be prevented."

Indra mounted his elephant, and, in the sight of the inhabitants of Dvārakā, went to the abode of the gods.

The environs of Prāgjyotiṣa were defended by nooses, constructed by the demon Muru, the edges of which were as sharp as razors; but Hari, throwing his discus Sudarśana amongst them, cut them to pieces. Then Muru started up, but Keśava slew him, and burnt his seven thousand sons, like moths, with the flame of the edge of his discus. Having slain Muru, Hayagrīva. and Pañchajana, the wise Hari rapidly reached the city of Prāgjyotiṣa: tnere a fierce conflict took place with the troops of Naraka in which Govinda destroyed thousands of demons; and when Naraka came into the field, showering upon the deity all sorts of weapons, the wielder of the discus, and annihilator. of the demon tribe, cut him in two with his celestial missile. Naraka being slain. Earth, bearing the two earrings of Aditi, approached the lord of the world, and said,

You, lord, whose aspect is ever gracious, has come to this sphere, in a portion of yourself, to lighten my burden. You are the eternal creator, preserver, and descrover of the universe; the origin of all worlds, and one with the universe: what praise can be worthily offered to you? You are the pervader, and that which is pervaded; the are, the agent, and the effect; the universal spirit of all beings; what praise can be worthily offered to you? You are the abstract soul, the sentient and the living soul of all beings, the imperishable: but since it is not possible to praise you worthily, then why should the hopeless attempt proceed? Have compassion, O universal soul, and forgive the sins which Naraka has committed. Verily it is for the sanctification of thy son that he has been killed by you."

The umbrella of Varuṇa, the jewel mountain which he also recovered, he placed upon Garuḍa; and mounting him himself, and taking Satyabhāmā with him, he set off to the heaven of the gods, to restore the earrings of Aditī[4].

4 The legend of Naraka is related in more detail in the Bhāgavata and Hari Vaṃśa. but is still more fully narrated in the Kālikā Upapuraṇa. It may be considered as one of the various intimations that occur in the Puraṇas of hostilities between the worshippers of Viṣṇu and Śiva; Naraka being in an especial degree favoured by the latter.

The notions that "I am–this is mine," which influence mankind, are but the delusions of the mother of the world, originating in thy active agency. Those men who, attentive to their duties, diligently worship you, traverse all this illusion, and obtain spiritual freedom, Brahmā and all the gods, men and animals, are alike invested by the thick darkness of, fascination, in the gulf of the illusions of Viṣṇu.

That men, who having worshipped you, should seek the gratification of their desires, and their own preservation, this, O lord, is also thy delusion. It is the sport of thy fascinations, that induces men to glorify you, to obtain thereby the continuance of their race, or the annihilation of their enemies, instead of eternal liberation. It is the fault of the impure acts of the unrighteous (to proffer such idle requests to one able to confer much more important benefits), like asking for a rag to cover one's nakedness from the tree that bestows whatever is solicited. Be propitious then, imperishable author of all the error that deceives the world; and dispel, O lord of all creatures, the conceit of knowledge, which proceeds from ignorance.

With the assent of Aditi. Indra then respectfully saluted Janārddana in all due form, and conducted him and Satyabbāmā through Nandana and other pleasant gardens of the gods; where Keśava, the destroyer of Keśi, saw the Pārijāta tree, the favourite of Śaci, which was produced when the ocean was churned for ambrosia: the bark was of gold, and it was embellished with young sprouting lcavcs of a copper colour, and fruit-stalks bearing numerous clusters of fragrant fruit. When Satyabhāmā noticed this tree, she said to her beloved lord, Govinda, "Why should not this divine tree be transported to Dvārikā? If what you say is true, and 1 am really dear to you, then let this tree be taken away from hcnce, and planted in the gardens of my dwclling.

I long to shine amidst my fellow queens, wearing the flowers of this tree in the braids of my hair."

The keepers of the garden remonstrated, and said, "This Pārijāta tree belongs to Śacī, the queen of the sovereign of the gods: it is not proper, Govinda, for you to remove it. At the time when the ocean was churned for the beverage of immortality, this tree was produced, for the purpose of providing Śacī with flowery ornaments. You cannot be suffered to depart with it. It is through ignorance that this is sought for by any one, as it is thc especial property of her on whose countenance the king of the gods delights to look; and who shall go away with impunity, who attempts to carry it off ?

It was produced at the churning of the ocean as the common property of all worlds. Wherefore, gods. should Indra alone possess it? In the same manner, guardians of the grove, as nectar, as the moon, as the goddess Śri herself, so the Pārijāta tree is the common property of all the world: and since Śacī, confiding in the-strength of her husband's arm, would keep it to herself, away with submission to her: Satyā takes away the tree.

I know your husband Śakra : I know the sovereign of the divinities; and I, who am a mortal, take this Pārijāta tree away from you."

Accordingly the warders of the garden went and reported to Śacī the message of Satyabhāmā, Sachī appealed to her husband, and excited the king of the gods to resent this affront: and Indra accordingly, attended by the army of the celestials, marched to attack Hari, in defence of the Pārijāta tree. The gods were armed with clubs, swords, maces, and darts; and- Indra wielded the thunderbolt. As soon as Govinda saw the king of the gods advancing against him on his elephant, attended by the immortals, he blew his shell so that the sound filled all the regions, and he showered smilingly myriads of arrows upon his assailants. Beholding the air in all directions overspread with his darts, the celestials in return hurled innumerable missiles; but every one of these the destroyer of Madhu and lord of all worlds, cut playfully into a thousand pieces with his shafts.

The devourer of serpents, Garuḍa, laid hold of the noose of the sovereign of the waters, and tore it to fragments with his beak, as if it had been a little snake. The son of Devakī threw his mace at the club of Yama, and cast it broken upon the ground: he cut in bits. the litter of the lord of wealth with his discus: a glance of his eye eclipsed the radiance of the sun: be severed Agni into a hundred parts with his arrows, and scattered the Vasus through the realms of space: with his discus he cut off the points of the tridents of the Rudras, and cast themselves upon the earth: and with the shafts shot from his bow he dispersed the Sédhyas, Viśvas, Maruts, and Gandharbas, like fleeces of cotton from the pods of the Simul tree, through the sky, Garuḍa also diligently plied his beak and wings and nails, and bit and bruised and scratched the deities who opposed his lord.

Beholding them thus prepared for fight, all the people of the three spheres exclaimed, "Alas ! alas !" Of what use is the sovereignty of heaven, embellished with the Pārijāta tree, no longer beholding Śacī meet you with offection as of yore ? NOTES

1 The Bhāgavata merely says. "Incited by his wife, Kṛṣṇa look away the Pārijāta tree, having subdued the gods, and planted it in the garden of Satyabhāmā, The Hari V. makes a long story of it, and tells it with some variations, especially in the commencement; Satyabhāmā's desire for the Pārijāta tree having been excited by Nārada's presenting a flower from it to Kṛṣṇa's other spouse. Maitreya said – How happened it, venerable Brahman, that a contest on account of Uṣā arose between Śiva and Kṛṣṇa ? and in what manner did Hari cut off the thousand arms of Bāṇa ? This, illustrious sir, you are able to narrate.

Parāśara said– Uṣā the daughter of Bāṇa, having seen Pārvatī sporting with her lord, Śambhu, was inspired with a wish for similar dalliance. The beautiful Gaurī, who knows the hearts of all, said to Uṣā, "Do not grieve; you shall have a husband." "But when will this be?" Thought Uṣā to herself, "or who will be my lord?" On which Pārvatī continued;

Accordingly, as the goddess had foretold, on that lunar day a youth appeared to Uṣā in a dream, of whose person she became enamoured. When she woke, and no longer perceived him, she was overcome with sorrow, and, unrestrained by modesty, demanded of her companion, whither he had gone.

The companion and friend of the princess was Chitralekhā, the daughter to Kubhāṇḍa, the minister of Bāṇa. "Of whom do you speak ?" Inquired she of Uṣā. But the princess, recollecting herself, was ashamed, and remained silent. At length, however, Chitralekhā conciliated her confidence, and she related to her what had passed, and what the goddess had foretold; and she requested her friend to devise some means of uniting her with the person whom she had bcheld in her dream.

Citralekhā then delineated the most eminent gods, demons, spirits, and mortals, and showed them to Uṣā. Putting aside the portraits to gods, spirits, snake-gods, and demons, the princess selected those of mortals, and amongst them the heroes of the races of Andhaka and Vriṣṇi. When she came to the likenesses of Kṛṣṇa and Rāma, she was confused with shame; from the portrait of Pradyumna she modestly averted her eyes; but the moment she beheld the picture of his son, the object of her passion, her eyes wide expanded, and all her bashfulness was discarded. "This is he! this is he!" said she to Citralekhā; and her friend, who was endowed with magic power, bade her be of good cheer, and sec off through the air to Dvārakā.

NOTES

1 The Bhāgavata says, each of his eight queens had ten sons, and gives the ten names to each set, with one or two exceptions.

Before this took place, Bāṇa had been engaged in the adoration of the three-eyed god, and had thus prayed to him: "I am humiliated, O lord, by the possession of a thousand arms in a state of peace; let some hostilities ensue, in which I may derive some advantage from their possession. Without war, what is the use to these arms ? They are but a burden to me."

Bāṇa, pleased by this promise, proffered his thanks to Śambhu, and returned to his palace, where he found his standard broken; at which his joy was increased.

At that time the nymph Citralekhā returned from Dvārakā, and by the exercise of her magic power brought Aniruddha along with her. The guards of the inner apartments discovering him there with Uṣā, reported it to the king who immediately sent a body of his followers to seize the prince; but the valiant youth, taking up an iron club, slew his assailants: on which Bāṇa mounted his car, advanced against him, and endeavoured to put him to death. Finding however, that Aniruddha was not to be subdued by prowess, he followed the counsel of his minister, and brought his magical faculties into the conflict, by which he succeeded in capturing the Yadu prince, and binding him in serpent bonds.

When Aniruddha was missed from Dvārāvatī, and Yādavas were inquiring of one another whither he had gone, Nārada came to them, and told them that he was the prisoner of Bāṇa, having been conveyed by a female, possessed of magic faculties, to Soṇitapura.[1] When they heared this, they were satisfied; for they had imagined he had been taken away by the gods (in reprisal for the Pārijāta tree).

Kṛṣṇa therefore immediately summoned Garuḍa, who came with a wish; and mounting upon him, along with Bala and Pradyumna, he set off for the city of Bāṇa. On their approach to the city they were opposed by the spirits who attend on Rudra, but these were soon destroyed by Hari, and he and his companions reached the vicinity of the town. Here mighty Fever, an emanation from Maheśwara, having three feet and three heads,[2] fought desperately with Viṣṇu in defence of Bāṇa.

Baladeva, upon whom his ashes were scattered, was seized with burning heat, and his eyelids trembled: but he obtained relief by clinging to the body of Kṛṣṇa. Contending thus with the divine holder of the bow, the Fever emanating from Śiva was quickly expelled from the person of Kṛṣṇa by Fever which he himself engendered. Brahmā beholding the impersonated malady bewildered by the beating inflicted by the arms of the deity, entreated the latter to desist; and the foe of Madhu refrained, and absorbed into himself the fever he had created. The rival Fever then departed, saying to Kṛṣṇa, "Those men who call to memory the combat between us shall be ever exempt from febrile disease."

Next Viṣṇu overcame and demolished the five fires,[2] and with perfect case annihilated the army of the Dānavas. Then the son of Bail (Bāṇa), with the whole of the Daitya host, assisted by Śankara and Kārtikeya, fought with Śauri. A fierce combat took place between Hari and Śankara, all the regions shook, scorched by their flaming weapons, and the celestials felt assured that the end to the universe was at hand. Govinda, with the weapon of yawning set Śankara a gape; and then the demons and the demigods attendant upon Śiva were destroyed on every side; for Hara, overcome with incessant gaping, sat down in his car, and was unable longer to contend with Kṛṣṇa, whom no acts affect. The deity of war, Kārtikeya, wounded in the arm by Garuḍa, struck by the weapons of Pradyumna, and disarmed by the shout of Hari, took to flight, Bāṇa, when he saw Śankara disabled, the Daityas destroyed, Guha fled, and Śiva's followers slain, advanced on his vast car, the horses to which were harnessed by Nandīśa, to encounter Kṛṣṇa and his associates Bala and Pradyumna.

The valiant Balabbadra, attacking the host of Bāṇa, wounded them in many ways with his arrows, and put them to a shameful rout; and their sovereign beheld them dragged about by Rāma with his ploughshare, or beaten by him with his club, or pierced by Kṛṣṇa with his arrows: he therefore attacked Kṛṣṇa, and a fight took place between them: they cast at each other fiery shafts, that pierced through their armour; but Kṛṣṇa intercepted with his arrows those of Bāṇa, and cut them to pieces. Bāṇa nevertheless wounded Keśava, and the wielder of the discus wounded Bāṇa; and both desirous of victory, and seeking enraged the death of his antagonist, hurled various missiles at each other. When an infinite number of arrows had been cut to pieces, and the weapons began to be exhausted. Kṛṣṇa resolved to put Bāṇa to death.

The destroyer of the demon host therefore took up his discus Sudarśana, blazing with the radiance of a hundred suns. As he was in the act to casting it, the mystical goddess Koṭavī, the magic lore of the demons, stood naked before him.[4] Seeing her before him, Kṛṣṇa, with unclosed eyes, cast Sudarśana, to cut off the arms of Bāṇa. The discus, dreaded in its flight by the whole of the weapons of the demons, lopped off successively the numerous arms of the Asura. Beholding Kṛṣṇa with the discus again in his hand, and preparing to launch it once more, for the total demolition of Bāṇa, the foe of Tripura (Śiva) respectfully addressed him. The husband of Umā, sceing the blood streaming from thc 'dissevered arms of Bāṇa, approached Govinda, to solicit a suspension of hostilities, and said to him,

I have given Bāṇa assurance of safety; do not you falsify that which I have spoken. He has grown old in devotion to me; let him not incur thy displeasure. "Since you, Śankara, have given a boon unto Bāṇa, Let him live, from respect to your promises, my discus is arrested: the assurance of safety granted by you is granted also by me. You are fit to apprehend that you are not distinct from me. That which I am, you are; and that also is this world, with its gods, demons, and mankind. Men contemplate distinctions, became they are scupified by ignorance." So saying, Kṛṣṇa went to the place where the son of Pradyumna was confined. The snakes that bound him were destroyed, being blasted by the breath of Garuḍa: and Kṛṣṇa, placing him, along with his wife, upon the celestial bird, returned with Pradyumna and Rāma to Dvārakā.[5]

NOTES

1. The synonyms of Śoṇitapura in the Trikāṇḍa Śeṣa are Devikoṭa, Bāṇapur, Koṭīvarṣam, and Uṣ āvana. The first is usually considered to be the modern Devicotta in the Karnatic, which is commonly believed to be the scene of Bāṇa's defeat. The name, however, occurs in other parts of India; in the Dekhin, on the banks of the Godāvarī, according to Wilford the capital of Muñja (As. Res. IX. 199); and in Assam, near Goalpāra, as the city of the Daityas. As. Res. XIV. 443. Hamilton notices the remains of a city so called in Dinajpur. in the Kālikā Purāṇa Bāṇa is described as the friend, and apparently neighbour, of Naraka. king of Pragjyotiṣ or Assam.

2 Alluding to the three stages of febrile paroxysms, or to the recurrence of tertian ague. A contest with this enemy, in the course of military operations is an allegory which the British armies in India too often illustrate.

3 The Āhavaniya, Gārhapatya. Dakṣiṇa, Sabhya, and Āvasathya, are the five fires; of which the three first have a religious, and the other two a secular character. The first is a fire prepared for oblations at an occasional sacrifice : the second is the household fire, to be perpetually maintained: the third is a sacrifical fire, in the centre of the other two, and placed to the south: the Sabhya is a fire lighted to warm a party: and the Āvasathya the common domestic or culinary fire. Manu. III. 100,185, and Kullūka Bhaṭṭa's explanation.

4 Koṭavī (कोटवी) is said to be an eighth portion of Rudrāṇī, and the tutelary goddess of the Daityas, composed of incantations (मन्त्रमयी). The Hari V. calls her also Lambā and intimates her being the mother of Bāṇa, and as identical with Durgā. The word in the lexicons designates a naked woman, and is thence appticable to Durgā in some of her forms.

5 There can be little doubt that this legend describes a serious struggle between the Śaivas and Vaiṣṇavas. in which the latter, according to their own report, were victorious : and the Saivas. although they attempt to make out a sort of compromise between Rudra and Kṛṣṇa, are obliged to admit his having the worst of the conflict, and his inability to protect his votary. The Bhāgavata tells the story much as the text. The Hari V. amplifics even more than usual, the narrative occupying nearly seventy pages of the French translation. The legend is to be found to the same purport, but in various degrees of detail, in the Agni Purāṇa Karma Purāṇa, Padma. Purāṇa (Uttara Khaṇḍa). Vāmana Purāṇa, and Brahma Vaivartta Purāṇa (Kṛṣṇa Janma Khaṇḍa).

There was a Vāsudeva who was called Pauṇḍraka[1], and who. Though not the Vāsudeva was flattered by ignorant people as the descended deity, until he fancied himself to be the Vāsudeva[2] who had come down upon earth. Losing all recollection of his real character, he assumed the emblems of Viṣṇu, and sent an ambassador to the magnanimous Kṛṣṇa with this message; "Relinquish, you foolish fellow, the discus; lay aside all my insignia, my name, and the character of Vāsudeva; and come and do me homage ; and I will vouchsafe you means of subsistence." At which Janārddana laughed, and replied, "Go messenger, back to Pauṇḍraka, and say to him from me, 'I will dispatch to you my emblem the discus without fail. You will rightly apprehend my meaning, and consider what is to be done, for I shall come to thy city, bringing the discus with me, and shall undoubtedy consign it to you. If you will command me to come, I will immediately obey, and be with you tomorrow; there shall be no delay: and, having sought thy asylum, I will so provide, O king that I shall never more have any thing to dread from you." So saying, he dismissed the ambassador to report these words to his sovereign; and summoning Garuḍa, mounted him, and set off for the city of Pauṇḍraka[3].

When the king of Kaśī heard of the preparations of Keśava, he sent his army (to the aid of Pauṇḍraka), himself bringing up the rear; and with the force of the king of Kaśī, and his own troops, Pauṇḍraka, the false Vāsudeva, marched to meet Kṛṣṇa. Hari beheld him afar off, standing in his car, holding a discus, a club, a mace, a scimitar, and a lotus, in his hands; ornamented with a garland of flowers ; beating a bow; and having his standard made of gold: he had also the Śrīvatsa mark delineated on his breast; he was dressed to yellow garments, and decorated with earrings and a tiara. When the god whose standard is Garuḍa beheld him, he laughed with a deep laugh, and engaged in conflict with the hostile host of cavalry and elephants, fighting with swords, scimitars, maces, tridents, spears, and bows. Showering upon the enemy the shafts from his Śāraṅga bow, and hurling at them his mace and discus, he quickly destroyed both the army of Pauṇḍraka and that of the king of Kaśī.

He then said to the former, who was foolishly wearing his emblems, "Pauṇḍraka, you desired me by your envoy to resign to you all my insignia. I now deliver them to you. Here is my discus; here I give up my mace; and here is Garuḍa, let him mount upon thy standard."

Thus speaking, he let fly the discus and the mace, by which Pauṇḍraka was cut to pieces, and cast on the ground; whilst the Garuḍa on his banner was demolished by the Garuḍa of Viṣṇu. The people, beholding this sight, exclaimed, "Alas! alas!" but the valiant king of Kaśī, adhering to the imposture of his friend, continued the conflct, till Śauri decapitated him with his arrows, shooting his head into the city of Kaśī, to the marvel of all the inhabitants. Having thus slain Pauṇḍraka and the king of Kaśī, with all their followers, Śauri returned to Dvārakā, where he lived in the enjoyment of heavenly delights.

When the inhabitants of Kaśī saw the head of their king shot into their, city, they were much astonished, and wondered how it could have happened, and by whom the deed could have been done. Having ascertained that the king had been killed by Kṛṣṇa, the son of the monarch of Kaśī[4] together with the priest of the family, propitiated Śankara; and that deity, well pleased to be adored in the sacred place Avimukta, desired the prince to demand a boon: on which he prayed, and said, "O lord, mighty god, through thy favour let thy mystic spirit arise to destroy Kṛṣṇa, the murderer of my father."

"It shall be so," answered Śankara: and from out of the southern fire upsprang a vast and formidable female,[5] like flame out of fire, blazing with ruddy light, and with fiery radiance streaming amidst her hair. Angrily she called upon Kṛṣṇa, and departed to Dvārakā; where the people, beholding her, were struck with dismay, and fled for protection to Madhusūdana, the refuge of all worlds. The wielder of the discus knowing that the fiend had been produced by the son of the king of Kaśī, through his adoration of the deity whose emblem is a bull, and being engaged in sportive amusements, and playing at dice, said to the discus, "Kill this fierce creature, whose tresses are of plaited flame." Accordingly Sudarśana, the discus of Viṣṇu, immediately attacked the fiend, fcarfully enwreached with fire, and wearing tresses of plaitcd name. Terrified at the might of Sudarśana, the creation of Maheśvara awaited not his attack, but fled with speed, pursued by him with equal velocity, until she reached Varānāśī, repelled by the superior might of the discus of Viṣṇu.

The army of Kaśī, and the host of the demigods attendant upon Śiva, armed with all kinds of weapons, then sallied out to oppose the discus ; but, skilled in the use of arms, he consumed the whole of the forces by his radiance, and then set fire to thc city, in which the magic power of Śiva had concealed herself.[3] Thus was Varānāśī burnt, with all its princes and their followers, inhabitants, elephants. horses, and men, treasures and granaries, houses, palaces, and markets. The whole of a city, that was inaccessible to the gods, was thus wrapped in flames by the discus of Hari, and was totally destroyed. The discus then, with unmitigated wrath, and blazing fiercely, and far from satisfied with the accomplishment of so easy a task, returned to the hand of Viṣṇu.[7]

NOTES

1 From being, the commentator says king of Puṇḍra. The Bhāgavata calls him chief of the Kārūṣ as; the Padma. king of Kāśī; but the Bhāgavata, as well as our text, makes the king of Kaśī his friend and ally.

2 According to the Padma Purāṇa, he propitiates Śiva, and obtains from him the insignia which constitute a Vāsudeva. The different authorities for this legend all use the term Vāsudeva in the sense to a title.

3 The Hari V. and Padma Purāṇa send Pauṇḍraka to Dvārakā. According to the latter, Nārada incites Pauṇḍraka to the aggression, telling him, he cannot be a Vāsudeva till he has overcome Kṛṣṇa: he goes, and is killed. The former work, as usual, enters into particulars of its own invention. Kṛṣṇa is absent on a visit to Śiva at Kailāśa, and during his absence Pauṇḍraka, assisted by Ekalavya, king of the Niṣādas, makes a night attack upon Dvārakā. They are resisted by the Yādavas under Sātyaki and Balarāma, by the former of whom Pauṇḍraka is repeatedly overthrown, and all but slain : he requires so much killing, however, that he is likely to obtain the victory, when Kṛṣṇa comes to the aid of his kinsmen, and after a protracted encounter, described in language employed a hundred times before, kills his competitor. The whole of the sections called the Kailāśa Yātrā. or Kṛṣṇa's journey to Kailāśa. must have been wanting in the copy used by M. Langlois. as they are not included in his translation. The chapters of the Hari V. according to his enumeration of them are 261: my copy has 316.

4. The Bhāgavata names him Sudakṣiṇa : the Padma, Daṇḍapāṇi.

5. A personified Kṛtyā. a magical creation. The Padma has the same. The Bhāgavata makes the product of the sacrificial fire a male and sends him to Dvārakā, accompained by a host of Bhūtas, Śiva's attendant goblins.

6. According to the Bhāgavata. the magical, being himself destroys Sudakṣiṇa and his priest; but Sudarśana consumes the people and the city. The Padma ascribes the destruction of the king and all his city to the discus. The Hari V. closes its narrative with the death of Pauṇḍraka, and makes no mention of the destruction of Benares. The circumstance is alluded to in a preceding section (s 159) by Nārada, when detailing the exploits of Kṛṣ ṇa.

7 In this legend, again, we have a contest between the followers of Viṣṇu and Śiva intimated, as, besides the assistance given by the latter to Pauṇḍraka. Benares--Varānasī or Atimukta–has been all time, as it is at present, the high place of the Śiva worship. There is also an indication of a Vaiṣṇava schism, in the competition between Pauṇḍra and Kṛṣṇa for the title of Vāsudeva, and the insignia of his divinity.

Maitreya said– I have a great desire to hear, excellent Brahman, some further account of the exploits of Balarāma. You have related to me his dragging the Yamunā, and other mighty deeds, but you can tell me, venerable sir, some other of his acts.

Parāśara said– Attend, Maitreya, to the achievements performed by Rāma, who is the eternal, illimitable Śeṣa. the upholder of the earth. At the choise of a husband by the daughter of Duryodhana, the princess was carried off by the hero Śāmba. the son of Jāmbavatī. Being pursued by Duryodhana, Karṇa. Bhīshma. When the Yādavas heard of the occurrence, their wrath was kindled against Duryodhana and his associates, and they prepared to take up arms against them; but Baladeva, in accents interrupted by the effects of ebriety. forbade them. and said, "I will go alone to the sons of Kuru; they will liberate Śāmba at my request."

When Duryodhana and the rest heard that he had arrived there they sent him a cow, a prcsent of fruits and flowers, and water. Bala received the offering in the customary form, and said to the Kauravas, "Ugrasena commands you to set Śāmba at liberty."

When Duryodhana, Kaṇa, Bhīṣma, Droṇa, and the others, heard this, they were very angry; and Bāhlika and other friends of the Kauravas, who looked upon the Yadu race as not entitled to regal dignity, said to the wielder of the club. "What is this, Balabhadra, that you have uttered? What Yādava shall give orders to the chiefs of the family of Kuru ? If Ugrasena issues his mandates to the Kauravas, then we must take away the white umbrella that he has usurped, and which is fit only for kings. Depart therefore. Balarāma; you are entitled to our respect; but Śāmba has been guilty of improper conduct, and we will not liberate him either at Ugrasena's commands or yours.

Having thus spoken, the Kuru chiefs, unanimously refusing to set the son of Hari at large, immediately returned into the city. Bala, rolling about with intoxication, and the wrath which their contemptuous language had excited, struck the ground furiously with his heel, so that it burst to pieces with a loud sound that reverberated through the regions of space. His eyes reddened with rage, and his brow was curved with frowns, as he exclaimed, "What arrogance is this, in such vile and pithless creatures! The sovereignty of the Kauravas, as well as our own, is the work of fate, whose decree it also is that they now disrespect or disobey the commands of Ugrasena. Indra may of right give his orders to the gods; and Ugrasena exercises equal authority with the lord to Sachī. Fie upon the pride that boasts a throne, the leavings of a hundred mortals! Is not he the sovereign of the earth, the wives of whose servants adorn themselves with the blossoms of the Pārijāta tree? Ugrasena shall be the undisputed king of kings; for I will not return to his capital until I have rid the world wholly of the sons of Kuru. I will destroy Karṇa, Duryodhana, Droṇa, Bhīshma. Bāhlika, Duśāśana. Bhūrisravas, Somadatta, Śalya, Bhīma, Arjuna, Yūdhishṭhica, the twins, and all the other vile descendants of Kuru, with their horses, elephants, and chariots. I will rescue the hero Śāmba from captivity, and carry him, along wirh his wife, to Dvārakā, where I shall again behold Ugrasena and the rest of my kin. Or, authorized by the king of the gods to remove the burdens of the earth. I will take this capital of the Kauravas, with all the sons of Kuru, and cast the city of the elephant into the Bhāgīrathī."

So saying, the wielder of the club, Baldeva, his eyes red with rage, plunged the blade of his ploughshare downwards, beneath the ramparts of the city, and drew them towards him. When the Kauravas beheld Hastināpura tottering, they were much alarmed, and called loudly on Rāma, saying, "Rāma, Rāma ! hold, hold ! suppress your wrath ! have mercy upon us! Accordingly, issuing hurriedly from the city, the Kauravas delivered Śāmba and his bride to the mighty Balarāma, who, bowing to Bhīṣma, Droṇa, and Kripa, who addressed him in conciliatory language, said, "I am satisfied ;" and so desisted. The city bears the marks of the shock it received, even to the present day–such was the might of Rāma–proving both his strength and prowess. The Kauravas then offering homage to Śāmba and to Bala, dismissed the former with his wife and a bridal portion.[1]

1 This adventure is related in the Bhāgavata, and very briefly noticed in the Hari Vaṃśa; but I have not found any mention of it in the Mahābhārata. It may have been suggested originally by Hastināpura having sustained some injury either from an earthquake or from the encroachments of the river, which, as is recorded, compelled the removal of the capital to Kausāmbī (Bk. IV. Ch. XX.)

Hear also, Maitreya, another exploit performed by the mighty Balarāma. The great Asura, the foe of the friends of the gods, Naraka, had a friend of exceeding prowess in the monkey named Dvivida, who was animated by implacable hostility against the deities, and vowed to revenge on the whole of them the destruction of Naraka by Kṛṣṇa, at the instigation of the king of the celestials, by preventing sacrifices, and effecting the annihilation of the mortal sphere. Blinded by ignorance, he accordingly interrupted all religious rites, subverted all righteous observances, and occasioned the death of living beings: he set fire to the forests, to villages and to towns: sometimes he overwhelmed cities and hamlets with falling rocks; or lifting up mountains in the waters, he cast them into the ocean: then taking his place amidst the deep, he agitated the waves, until the foaming sea rose above its confines, and swept away the villages and cities situated upon its shores. Dvivida also, who could assume what shape he would, enlarged his bulk to an immense size, and rolling and tumbling and trimping amidst the corn fields, he crushed and spoiled the harvests. The whole world, disordered by this iniquitous monkey, was deprived of sacred study and religious rites, and was greatly afflicted.

On one occasion Halāyudha was drinking in the groves of Raivata, along with the illustrious Revatī and other beautiful females; and the distinguished Yadu, in whose praises songs were sung, and who was preminent amidst graceful and sportive women, resembled Kuvera, god of riches, in his palace. Whilst thus engaged, the monkey Dvivida came there, and stealing the ploughshare and the club of Baladeva, grinned at and mocked him, and laughed at the women, and threw over and broke the cups filled with wine. Balarāma, becoming angry at this, threatened the monkey; but the latter disregarded his menaces, and made a chattering noise: on which Bala, starting up, seized his club in wrath; and the monkey laid hold of a large rock, which be hurled at the hero. Bala casting his club at it, as it neared him, broke it into a thousand fragments, which, together with the club, fell upon the ground. Beholding the club prostrate, the monkey sprang over it, and struck the Yādava violently on the breast with his paws. Bala replied with a blow of his fist upon the forehead of Dvivida, which felled him, vomiting blood. and lifeless, to the earth. The crest of the mountain on which he fell was splintered into a hundred pieces by the weight of his body, as if the thunderer had shivered it with his thunderbolt.

The gods threw down a shower of flowers upon Râma, and approached him, and praised him for the glorious feat he had performed. "Well has the world been freed," said they, " by your prowess. O hero, of this vile ape, who was the ally of the enemy of the gods." Then they and their attendant spirits returned well pleased to heaven.

Many such inimitable deeds were wrought by the illustrious Baladeva, the impersonation of Śeṣa, the supporter of the earth.[1]

NOTES

1 This exploit of Balarāma is also similarly, but. more vulgarly, related in the Bhāgavata. It is simply laid in the Hari Vaṃśa. and erroneously. that Meṇḍa and Dvivida were conquered by Kṛṣṇa.

In this manner did Kṛṣṇa. assisted by Baladeva, destroy demons and iniquitous monarchs, for the good of the earth; and along with Phālguna[1] also did he relieve earth of her load, by the death of innumerable hosts. Having thus lightened the burdens of the earth, and slain many unrighteous princes, he exterminated, by the pretext of an imprecation denounced by Brāhmaṇas. his own Yādava race. Then quitting Dvārakā, and relinquishing his mortal being. the self-born reentered. with all his emanations, his own sphere of Viṣṇu.[2]

Parāśara said– At the holy place Piṇḍāraka,[4] Visvāmitra, Kaṇva. and the great sage Nārada. were observed by some boys of the Yadu tribe. Giddy with youth. and influenced by predestined results, they dressed and adorned Śāmba, the son of Jāmbavatī as a damsel, and conducting her to the sages, they addressed them with the usual marks of reverence, and said. "What child this female, the wife of Babhru. who is anxious to have a son. give birth to ?" The sages, who were possessed of divine wisdom, were very angry to find themselves thus tricked by the boys. and said. "She will bring forth a club, that shall crush the whole of the Yādava race."

The boys. thus spoken to by the sage, went and related all that had occurred to Ugrasena; and, as foretold, a club was produced from, the belly of Śāmba. Ugrasena had the club, which was of iron. ground to dust, and thrown into the sea, but the particles of dust there became rushes.[5] There was one part of the iron club which was like the bladc of a lance, and which the Andhakas could not break: this, when thrown into the sea, was swallowed by a fish; the fish was caught, the iron spike was extracted from its belly, and was taken by a hunter named Jarā. The all-wise and glorious Madhusūdana did not think fit to counteract what had been predetermined by fate.

Then there came to Keśava, when he was private and alone, a messenger from the gods, who addressed him with reverence, and said, "I am sent to you. O lord, by the deities, and do you hear what Indra, together with the Viśvas, Maruts, Ādityas, Sādhyas, and Rudras, respectfully represents. "More than a hundred years have elapsed since you, in favour to the gods, has descended upon earth, for the purpose of relieving it of its load. The demons have been slain, and the burden of earth has been removed: now let the immortals once again behold their monarch in heaven. A period exceeding a century has passed: now, if it be thy pleasure, return to Svarga. This is the solicitation of the celestials. But should such not be thy will. then remain here as long as it may be desirable to thy dependants."[6]

To this Kṛṣṇa replied, "All that you have said I am well aware of the destruction of the Yādavas by me has commenced. The burdens of the earth are not removed until the Yādavas are extirpated. I will effect this also in my descent, and quickly; for it shall come to pass in seven nights. When I have restored the land of Dvārakā to the ocean, and annihilated the race of Yadu, I will proceed to the mansions of the immortals. Apprise the gods, that, having abandoned my human body, and accompanied by Saṅkarṣaṇa, I will then return to them. The tyrants that oppressed the earth, Jarāsandha and the rest, have been killed; and a youth, even of the race of Yadu, is, no less than they, an encumbrance. When therefore I have taken away this great weight upon earth, I will return to protect the sphere of the celestials. Say this to them."

Parāśara continued– The messenger of the gods. having received this reply, bowed, and took his heavenly course to the king of the gods. The mighty Kṛṣṇa now beheld signs and portents both in earth and heaven, prognosticating, day and night, the ruin of Dvārakā.[7] Showing these to the Yādavas, he said, "See; behold these fearful phenomena : let us hasten to Prabhāṣa, to avert these omens."

When he had thus spoken to the eminent Yādava, the illustrious Uddhava saluted and said to him, "Tell me, O lord, what it is proper that I should do, for it seems to me that you will destroy all this race: the signs that are manifest declare nothing less than the annihilation of the tribe." Then Kṛṣṇa replied to him, Parāśara continued– Accordingly Uddhava, thus instructed by Keśava, saluted him with veneration, and departed to the shrine of Naranārāyana.[8] Then the Yādavas ascended their rapid cars, and drove to Prabhāsa,[9] along with Kṛṣṇa, Rāma, and the rest of their chiefs.[10] They bathed there, and, excited by Vāsudeva, the Kukkuras and Andhakas indulged in liquor. As they drank, the destructive flame of dissension was kindled amongst them by mutual collision, and fed with the fuel of abuse. Infuriated by the divine influence, they fell upon one another with missile weapons, and when those were expended, they had recourse to the rushes growing nigh.

The rushes in their hands became like thunderbolt!, and they struck one another with their fatal blows. Pradyumna, Sāmba, Kritavarman, Sātyaki, Aniruddha, Prithu, Viprithu, Chatuvarman, Chāruka, Akrūra, and many others, struck one another with the rushes, which had assumed the hardness of thunderbolts.[11] Keśava interposed to prevent them, but they thought that he was taking part with each severally, and continued the conflict. Kṛṣṇa then enraged took up a handful of rushes to destroy them, and the rushes became a club of iron, and with this he slew many of the murderous Yādavas; whilst others, fighting fiercely, put an end to one another. The chariot of the holder of the discus, named Jaitra, was quickly carried off by the swift steeds, and swept away by the sea, in the sight of Dāruka the charioteer. The discus, the club, the bow, the quiver, the shell, and the sword of Keśava, having circumambulated their lord, flew along the path of the sun. In a short time there was not a single Yādava left alive, except the mighty Kṛṣṇa and Dāruka.[12] Going towards Rāma, who was sitting at the root of a tree. they beheld a large serpent coming out of his mouth. Having issued from his mouth, the mighty snake proceeded towards the ocean, hymned by saints and by other great serpents. Bringing an offering of respect. Ocean came to meet him; and then the majestic being, adored by attendant snakes, entered into the waters of the deep.

Apprise Āhuka and all the inhabitants of Dvārakā,[13] that the sea will inundate the town: be ready therefore in expectation of the coming of Arjuna. and when he quits Dvārakā, no longer abide there, but go whither so ever that descendant of Kuru shall repair. Do you also go to the son of Kuru, and tell him, that it is my request that he will grant what protection he can to all my family. Then depart with Arjuna and all the people of Dvārāvatī, and let Vajra be installed sovereign over the tribe of Yadu."

The divine Govinda then, having concentrated in himself that supreme spirit: which is one with Vāsudeva. was identified with all beings.[14] Respecting the words of the Brahman, the imprecation of Durvāsas,[15] the illustrious Kṛṣṇa sat engaged in thought, resting his foot upon his knee.

Then came there a hunter, named Jarā[16] whose arrow was tipped with a blade made of the piece of iron of the club, which had not been reduced to powder; and beholding from a distance the foot of Kṛṣṇa, he mistook it for part of a deer, and shooting his arrow, lodged it in the sole.[17] Approaching his mark, he saw the four-armed king, and falling at his feet, repeatedly besought his forgiveness, exclaiming, "I have done this deed unwittingly, thinking I was aiming at the deer! Have pity upon me, who am consumed by my crime; for you are to consume me!"

Bhagavat replied, "Fear not you in the least." Go, hunter, through my favour, to heaven the abode of the gods. As soon as he held thus spoken, a celestial car appeared, and the hunter, ascending it, forthwith proceeded to heaven. Then the illustrious Kṛṣṇa having united himself with his own pure spiritual, inexhaustible, inconceivable, unborn, undecaying, imperishable, and universal spirit, which is one with Vāsudeva, abandoned his mortal body and the condition of the threefold qualities.[18]

NOTES

1. A name of Arjuna, the great friend of Kṛṣṇa, to whom the latter served as charioteer in the war between the Paṇḍus and Kurus.

2. With Balarāma, Pradyumna, Aniruddha, and the rest.

3. The legend of the destruction of the Yādava race, and the death of Kṛṣṇa, appears probably in its Mauśala Parva of the Mahābhārata. It forms the narrative portion of the eleventh book of the Bhāgavata, having been previously briefly adverted to in the first and third books; and it is summarily told in the Uttara Khaṇḍa of the Padma Purāṇa.

4. The village of Piṇḍāraka, still held in veneration, is situated in Gujarat, about twenty miles from the north-west extremity of the Peninsula, Hamilton. II 664.

5. The term is Erakā (एरका), which is explained in some medical lexicons, 'a kind of grass.' The commentator also calls it a kind of grass : and in the text of the Mahābhārata the term subsequently used, and as synonymous with it. is Tṛṇa (तृण), 'grass.' The Mahābhārata, describing the affray which follows, mentions that the grass or rushes. on being plucked by Kṛṣṇa and the Yādavas, turn to clubs. The text, and that of the Bhāgavata, here say, that the powdered particle, floating on the sea, became rushes : or the latter may imply, that they fastened upon grass or weeds. The commentator, however, explains that the particles of iron being borne to land, they were so transformed. The Mahābhārata says nothing of the piece which could not be pounded, and this seems to be an embellishment either of our text or the Bhāgavata, The Mahābhārata, however, adds another precaution, which the two others have left unnoticed. Ugrasena causes a proclamation to be made, that none of the inhabitants of Dvārakā shall thenceforth drink wine, on pain of being impaled alive; and the people for some time observe the prohibition.

6. Nothing of this kind occurs in the Mahābhārata our text therefore offers an embellishment. The Bhāgavata, again improves upon the text; for, not content with a messenger, it makes Brahmā with the Prajāpatis, Śiva with the Bhūtas, Indra with the other divinities, all come in person : indicating evidently a later date, as plainly as the addition of the text shows it to be subsequent to the date of the legend in the Mahābhārata.

7. The Mahābhārata, which delights in describing portents and signs, does not fail to detail them here. A dreadful figure, death personified, haunts every house, coming and going no one knows how, and being invulnerable to the weapons by which he is assailed. Strong hurricanes blow; large rats multiply, and infest the roads and houses, and attack persons in their sleep; Sārikās, or starlings, utter inauspicious screams in their cages; storks imitate the hooting of owls, and goats the howling of jackals; cows bring-forth foals, and camels mules ; food, in the moment of being eaten, is filled with worms; fire burns with discoloured flames: and at sunset and sunrise the air is traversed by headless and hideous spirits. There is more to the same effect, which neither our text nor the Bhāgavata has ventured to detail. The whole passage has been published in Maurice's Ancient History of Hindustan. 11. 463; translated apparently by the late Sir Charles Wilkins. The names have been much disfigured either by the copyist or compositor.

8. In the Mahābhārata it is said merely that Uddhava, who was versed in Yoga, foreseeing the destruction of the Yādavas, went away : that is, according to the commentator, he practised penance, and went to heaven: जगाम योगमास्थाय परलोकं। The Bhāgavata, taking the hint makes much more of it than our text, and expands it into a long course of instruction given by Kṛṣṇa to Uddhava, occupying 150 leaves.

9. See Bk. V. Ch. XXI. n. 3. By sending the Yādavas to Prabhāsa, the commentator asserts, Kṛṣṇa prevented purposely the Yādavas from obtaining Mukti. 'final liberation,' which would have been the consequence of dying at Dvārakā. Death at Prabhāsa conferred only Indra's heaven.

10. The Mahābhārata describes them as going forth with horses, elephants, and car, and their women and abundance of good cheer, and varieties of wine and meat: बहु नानाविधं चक्रुर्मद्यं मांसमनेकशः।

11. The Bhāgavata, like the text, adverts only in this general manner to the conflict; but the Mahābhārata gives the particulars Yuyudhāna reproaches Kṛtavarman with having aided Aśvatthāman in his night attack on the Pāndu camp, and killing warriors in their sleep. Pradynmna joins in the abuse. Kṛtavarman retorts. Kṛṣṇa looks at him angrily. Sātyaki repeats the story of the Śyamantaka gem, by which he accuses Kṛtavarman of being an accomplice in the murder of Satrajit (Bk. IV. Ch. XIII). Satyabhāmā, the daughter of the latter, then mixes in the quarrel, and incites Kṛṣṇa to avenge her : but Śātyaki anticipates him, and murders Kṛtavarman. Saineya and the Bhojas attack Sātyaki; the Andhakas defend him : and the affray becomes general. Kṛṣṇa attempts to part the combatants, until Pradyumna is killed; and then taking up a handful of rushes, which become an iron club, he kills indiscriminately all that come in his way. The conflict continues until the greater part of the combatants have fallen, including all Kṛṣṇa's sons, and he then in wrath sweeps off all the survivors, except Babhru and Dāruka with his discus.

12. The Mahābhārata, as observed at the end of the last note, adds Babhru, but it presently gets rid of him, Kṛṣṇa sends him to take care of the old people, the women, and children, in Dvārakā, whilst Dāruka goes to bring Arjnna to their aid: but as he goes along, overcome with grief for the loss of his kindred, and approaching separation from Kṛṣṇa, he is killed by a club that is cast from a snare or trap set by a hunter. Kṛṣṇa then goes to Dvārakā, and desires Vasudeva to await the coming of Arjuna, after which he returns to Rāma, and sees the phenomenon described in the text; the serpent being Śeṣa, of whom Balarāma was the incarnation. The Bhāgavata does not mention this incident, merely observing that Rāma, by the power of Yoga, returencd into himself ; that is, into Viṣṇu.

13. The women, the elders, and the children, amongst whom, as we shall presently see, was Vajra, the son of Aniruddha, who was established as chief of the Yādavas at Indraprastha, and who therefore escaped the destruction which overwhelmed their kinsmen, the Vṛṣṇis. Kukkuras, and Andhakas, of Dvārakā. This was a fortunate reservation for the tribes which in various parts of India, both on the Ganges and in the Dakhin, profess to derive their origin from the Yādavas.

14. The process is explained by the commentator : 'By the force of Dhyāna or abstraction. Kṛṣṇa satisfies himself that he is Brahma (ब्रह्मैवाहमिति ध्यात्वा), or universal spirit: and is next convinced that he is therefore all things (सर्वभूतान्यप्यहमेव); by which his individuality ceases.

15 The story is told in the Mahābhārata. Durvāsas was on one occasion hospitably entertained by Kṛṣṇa, but the latter omitted to wipe away the fragments of the meal which had fallen on the foot of the irascible sane, who thereupon foretold that Kṛṣṇa should be killed as in the text.

17 The Bhāgavata explains how this part of the foot became exposed. Kṛṣṇa had assumed one of the posturea in which abstraction is practised : he had laid his left leg across his right thigh, by which the sole of the foot was turned outwards.

18 He became Nirguna, 'devoid of all qualities.'

Arjuna having found the bodies of Kṛṣṇa and of Rāma, performed for them, and the rest of the slain, the obsequial rites. The eight queens of Kṛṣṇa, who have been named, with Rukmiṇī at their head, embraced the body of Hari, and entered the funeral fire[1]. Revatī also embracing the corpse of Rāma, entered the blazing pile, which was cool to her, happy in contact with her lord. Hearing these events, Ugrasena and Ānakadundubhi, with Devakī and Rohiṇī, committed themselves to the flames[2]. The last ceremonies were performed for all these by Arjuna, who then made all the people leave the city, and took Vajra with him. The son of Kuntī conducted the thousands of the wives of Kṛṣṇa, with Vajra, and all the people, from Dvārakā, with tenderness and care, and travelled slowly away. The Sudharman palace and the Pārijāta tree, which had been brought to earth by Kṛṣṇa, both proceeded to heaven; and on the same day that Hari departed from the earth the powerful dark-bodied Kali age descended[3]. The ocean rose, and submerged the whole of Dvārakā except alone the dwelling of the deity of the race of Yadu. The sea has not yet been able to wash that temple away, and there Keśava constantly abides, even in the present day. Whoever visits that holy shrine, the place where Kṛṣṇa pursued his sports, is liberated from all his sins[4].

The son of Pṛthā, Arjuna, halted the people he had brought from Dvārakā in the Pañcanada country[5], in a rich and fertile spot; but the desires of the robbers (of the neighbourhood) were excited, when they observed so many widowed females, also such great riches, in the possession of Arjuna alone. Inflamed by their cupidity, they assembled the villainous Ābhīra[6], and said to them, "Here is this Arjuna, immensely rich, and having numerous women, whose husbands have been slain, passing confidently amongst us; a disgrace to all brave men. His pride is raised by the death of Bhīṣma, Droṇa, Jayadratha, Karṇa, and others, whom he has slain: he does not know the prowess of simple villagers. Up, up; take you long thick staves: this stupid fellow despises us. Why should we not lift up our arms?" So saying, they rushed, armed with cudgels and clods of earth, upon the people, who were without their lord. Arjuna encountered them, and said to them in derision, "Retire, wretches, ignorant of what is right, unless you are desirous of dying." But they disregarded his menaces, and seized his treasures and his women, the wives of Visvakṣena. Thereupon Arjuna began to brace his heavenly bow Gāṇḍīva, irresistible in battle; but it was in vain; for, in spite of all his efforts to tighten it, it continued flaccid: neither could he call to recollection the incantations of the superhuman weapons. Losing all patience, he launched, as best he might, his shafts upon the enemy; but those shot from Gāṇḍīva merely scratched the skin. The arrows given him by Agni to carry certain destruction now were themselves destroyed, and were fatal to Arjuna in his contest with herdsmen. He endeavoured to recall the might to Kṛṣṇa; animated by which, his numerous arrows had overthrown mighty kings; but he tried in vain, for now they were put aside by the peasants, or they flew at random, wide of their aim. His arrows being expended, he beat the banditti with the horn of his bow; but they only laughed at his blows: and the barbarians, in the sight of Arjuna, carried off all the women of the Vṛṣṇi and Andhaka tribes, and went their way[7].

Then Jiṣṇu was sorely distressed, and lamented bitterly , exclaiming, "Alas! alas! I am deserted by my lord!" and he wept: and in that instant the bow and heavenly arms, his car and steeds, perished entirely, like a donation to an unlearned Brahman. "Resistless," said he, "are the decress of fate, by whom feebleness has been inflicted upon me, deprived of my illustrious friend, and victory given to the base. These two arms are mine; mine is this fist; this is my place; I am Arjuna: but without that righteous aid all these are pityless. The valour of Arjuna, the strength of Bhīma, was all his work; and without him I am overcome by peasants: it cannot be from any other cause." So saying, Arjuna went to the city of Mathurā and there installed and Yādava prince, Vajra, as its king. There he beheld Vyāsa, who was living in a wood, and he approached the sage, and saluted him respectfully. The Muni surveyed him for some time, as he lay prostrate at his feet, and said to him, "How is it that I see you thus shorn of your lustre? Have you been guilty of illicit intercourse with women, or of the death of Brahman? Or have you suffered some grievous disappointment? that you are so dejected. Have your prayers for progeny, or other goods gifts, proved fruitless? Or have you indulged improper passions? that your lustre is so dim. Or are you one that devours the meal he has given to the Brahmans? Say, Arjuna, have you seized upon the substance of the poor? Has the wind of winnowing basket lighted upon you? or has an evil eye gazed upon you, Arjuna? that you look thus miserable. Have you been touched by the water of a fingernail? or has the water of a water-jar sprinkled you? or, what is most probably the case, have you been beaten by your inferiors in battle?"

Arjuna, having sighed deeply, related to Vyāsa all the circumstances of his discomfiture, and continued : "Hari, who was our strength, our might, our heroism, our prowess, our prosperity, our brightness, has left us, and departed. Deprived of him, our friend, illustrious, and ever kindly speaking, we have become as feeble as if made of straw. Puruṣottama, who was the living vigour of my weapons, my arrows and my bow, is gone. As long as we looked upon him, fortune, fame, wealth, dignity never abandoned us: but Govinda is gone from amongst us. That Kṛṣṇa has quitted earth, through whose power Bhīṣ ma, Droṇa, the king do Aṅga, Duryodhana, and the rest, were consumed. Not I alone, but Earth, has grown old, miserable and lustreless, in the absence of the holder of the discus. Kṛṣṇa, through devotion to whom Bhīṣma and other mighty men perished like moths in the flame of my valour, is gone; and I am now overcome by cowherds.

That I am shorn of my lustre I do not marvel: it is wonderful that I live. Surely, grandsire, I alone am so shameless as to survive the stain of indignity inflicted by the vile."

Vyāsa replied to Arjuna, and said, "Think no more, my son, of your disgrace: it does not become you to grieve. Know that time subjects all beings to similar vicissitude. Time effects the production and dissolution of all creatures. All that exists is founded on time. Know this, Arjuna, and retain your fortitude. Rivers, seas, mountains, the whole earth, gods, men, animals, trees, insects, are all created, and all will be destroyed by time. Knowing that all that is, is the effect of time, be tranquillized. These mighty works of Kṛṣṇa, whatever they have been performed to relieve earth of its burdens: for this he has come down. Earth, oppressed by her load, has had recourse to the assembly of the immortals; and Janārddna, who is one with time, has descended on that account. This object has been now accomplished: all the kings of the earth are slain; the race of Vṛṣṇi and Andhaka is destroyed: no more remained for him to accomplish.

Therefore has the lord departed whither he pleased, his ends being all fulfilled. At the period of creation the god of gods creates; in that duration he preserves; and at the end of all is mighty to annihilate. Now all is done. Therefore, Arjuna, be not afflicted by the defeat: the prowess of mortals is the gift of time. Bhīṣma, Karṇa and other kings, have been slain by you alone; this was the work of time; and why, therefore, should not your discomfiture, by those less than you are, occur? In like manner as through your devotion to Viṣṇu these were overthrown by you, so at last has your defeat by miserable thieves been wrought by time. That divinity, assuming various bodies, preserves the world; and in the end the lord of creatures destroys it. In the birth of thy fortunes Janārddana was thy friend; in their decline, they enemies have been favoured by Keśava. Who would have believed that you should slay all the descendants of Kuru, and kindred of Gangā? Who would have believed that peasants should triumph over you? Be assured, son of Prithā, that it is but the sport of the universal Hari that the Kauravas have been destroyed by you, and that you have been defeated by herdsmen With respect to the women whom you lament, and who have been carried off by the thieves, hear from me an ancient story, which will explain why this has happened.

"In former times a Brāhmaṇa, named Aṣṭāvakra[9], was pursuing his religious penances, standing in water, and meditating on the eternal spirit, for many years. In consequences of the overthrow of the Asuras, there was a great festival on the summit of Meru: on their way to which, Rambhā, Tilottamā, and hundreds and thousands of beautiful nymphs, saw the ascetic Aṣṭāvakra, and they praised and hymned him for his devotions. They bowed down before him, and eulogized him, as he was immersed up to his throat in water, his hair twisted in a braid. So they sang in honour of him whatever they thought would be most agreeable to that most eminent of Brāhmaṇas.

Aṣṭāvakra at last said to them, 'I am well pleased with you, illustrious damsels; whatever you wish for, ask of me, and I will give it you, however, difficult it may be of attainment.' Then all those nymphs, Rambhā, Tilottamā, and others, recorded in the Vedas, replied, 'It is enough for us that you are pleased; what need we aught else, venerable Brahman?' But some amongst them said, 'If, exalted sir, you are indeed pleased with us, then grant us a husband, the best of men, and sovereign of the Brahmans.'

'So be it,' replied Aṣṭāvakra, and thereupon came up from the waters. When the nymphs beheld him coming out of the water, and saw that he was very ugly, and crooked in eight places, they could not restrain their merriment, but laughed aloud. The Muni was very angry, and cursed them, and said, 'Since you have been so impertinent as to laugh at my deformity, I denounce upon you this imprecation : through the grace I have shown unto you, you shall obtain the first of males for your husband; but in consequence of my curse, you shall afterwards fall into the hands of thieves.' When the nymphs heard this uttered by the Muni, they endeavoured to appease him; and they so far succeeded, that he announced to them they should finally return to the sphere of the gods. It is in consequence, then, of the curse of the Muni Aṣṭāvakra that these females, who were at first the wives of Keśava, have now fallen into the hands of the barbarians; and there is no occasion, Arjuna, for you to regret it in the least. All this destruction has been effected by the lord of all; and your end is also nigh at hand, since he has withdrawn from you strength, splendour, valour, and pre-eminence.

Death is the doom of every one who is born; fall is the end of exaltation: union terminates in separation: and growth tends but to decay. Knowing all this, wise men are susceptible of neither grief nor joy; and those who learn their ways are even as they are (equally free from pleasure or pain). Do you therefore, most excellent prince, understand this truth and, along with your brothers, relinquish every thing, and repair to the holy forest. Go now, and say from me to Yudhiṣṭhira, that he to-morrow, with his brethren, tread the pach of heroes."

Thus instructed by Vyāsa Arjuna went and related to the other sons of Pṛthā all that he had seen, and experienced, and had heard. When he had communicated to them the message of Vyāsa, the sons of Pāṇḍu placed Parīkṣit on the throne, and went to the forest.

I have thus narrated to you, Maitreya, in detail, the action of Vāsudeva, when he was born in the race of Yadu.

NOTES

1. The Mahābhārata takes the wives of Kṛṣṇa first to Indraprasthā, and there Rukmiṇī and four others burn; but Satyabhāmā and others become ascetics, going to perform Tapasyā in the forest.

2. It is merely said in the Mahābhārata that Vasudeva expired; on which four of his wives burnt themselves.

3. The Kali age commenced from the death of Kṛṣṇa, according to the usual notions; but it is commonly supposed to commence a little later, or with the reign of Parīkṣit.

4. The Bhāgavata agrees with the text in excepting the temple of Dvārakā, and asserting that it still remains, in direct contradiction of the Mahābhārata, which declares that the sea did not spare any part whatever. It is clear, therefore, that when the latter was compiled the temple was not standing, and that it was erected between the date of the compilation and that of the two Purāṇas. The present shrine, which is held in great repute, stands at the extremity of the peninsula of Guzerat. It is still an object of pilgrimage; it was so in the reign of Akbar (Ayin Akbari); and has been so, on doubt, from a remote period. The image formerly worshipped there was carried off 600 years ago, and this was most probably subsequent to the date of both the Purāṇas; for the idol was a form of Kṛṣ ṇa, called Raṇa chor, a popular divinity, unknown in the Paurāṇik pantheon. Another image was substituted in place of that which was taken away. Notwithstanding the testimony of our text. and that of the Bhāgavata, the originality of the temple is disputed, and a place thirty miles south from Porbandar is said to be the spot where Dvārakā was swallowed up by the ocean. Hamilton, from Macmurdo, &c. 1.662.

5. The country of the five rivers. the Punjab: rather an out of the way route from Dvārkā to Delhi.

6. Abhīras mean 'herds', and they are afterwards called by Arjuna, Gopālas, 'Herdsmen'. The pastoral tribes of the west of India, and particularly those of Afghanistan, almost always combine the character of freebooter with that of shepherd.

7. The Principal wives of Kṛṣṇa, however, according to the Mahabhārata, escaped. The occurrence is described there much in the same way, but more briefly. It is not detailed in the Bhāgavata.

8. A name of Vyāsa.

9. The story of Ashṭāvakra is related in the Mahabhārata. He was the son of Kahora, who neglecting his wife, was rebuked for it by his yet unborn son. The father angrily cursed him, that he should be born bent in every part; and he was accordingly brought forth crooked (vakra) in eight limbs (ashṭa). He became nevertheless a celebrated sage. Maitreya said– You have narrated to me, illustrious sage, the creation of the world, the genealogies of the patriarchs, the duration of the Manvantaras, and the dynastics of princes, in detail. I am now desirous to hear from you an account of the dissolution of the world, the season of total destruction, and that which occurs at the expiration of the Kalpa[1].

Parāśara said– Hear from me, Maitreya, exactly the circumstances of the end of all things, and the dissolution that occurs either at the expiration of a Kalpa, or that which takes place at the close of the life of Brahmā. A month of mortals is a day and night of the progenitors: a year of mortals is a day and night of the gods. Twice a thousand aggregates of the four ages is a day and night of Brahmā[2]. The four ages are the Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara, and Kali; comprehending together twelve thousand years of the gods. There are infinite successions of these four ages, of a similar description, the first of which is always called the Kṛta, and the last the Kali. In the first, the Kṛta, is that age which is created by Brahmā; in the last, which is the Kali age, a dissolution of the world occurs.

Maitreya said– Venerable sir, you are able to give me a description of the nature of the Kali age, in which four-footed virtue[3] suffers total extinction.

Parāśara replied– Hear, Maitreya, an account of the nature of the Kali age, respecting which you have inquired, and which is now close at hand.

The observance of caste, order, and institutes will not prevail in the Kali age, nor will that of the ceremonial enjoined by the Sāma, Ṛk, and Yajur Vedas. Marriages in this age will not be conformable to the ritual, nor will the rules that connect the spiritual preceptor and his disciple be in force. The laws that regulate the conduct of husband and wife will be disregarded, and oblations to the gods with fire no longer be offered. In whatever family he may be born, a powerful and rich man will be held entitled to espouse maidens of every tribe. A regenerate man will be initiated in any way whatever and such acts of penance as may be performed will be unattended by any results[4]. Every text will be scripture that people choose to think so[5]: all gods will be gods to them that worship them; and all orders of life will be common alike to all persons. In the Kali age, fasting austerity, liberality, practised according to the pleasure of those by whom they are observed, will constitute righteousness. Pride of wealth will be inspired by very insignificant possessions.

Pride of beauty will be prompted by (on other personal charm than fine) hair. Gold, jewels, diamonds, clothes, will all have perished, and then hair will be the only ornament with which women can decorate themselves. Wives will desert their husbands, when they lose their property; and they only who are wealthy will be considered by women as their lords.

He who gives away much money will be master of men; and family descent will no longer be a title of supremacy. Accumulated treasures will be expended on (ostentatious) dwellings. The minds of men will be wholly occupied in acquiring wealth; and wealth will be spent solely on selfish gratifications. Women will follow their inclinations, and be ever fond of pleasure. Men will fix their desires upon riches, even though dishonestly acquired.

No man will part with the smallest fraction of the smallest coin[6], though entreated by a friend. Men of all degrees will conceit themselves to be equal with Brahmans. Cows will be held in esteem only as they supply milk[7]. The people will be almost always in dread of dearth, and apprehensive of scarcity; and will hence ever be watching the appearances of the sky: they will all live, like anchorets, upon leaves and roots and fruit, and put a period to their lives through fear of famine and want.

In truth there will never be abundance in the Kali age, and men will never enjoy pleasure and happiness. They will take their food without previous ablution, and without worshipping fire, gods, or offering obsequial libations to their progenitors. The women will be fickle, short of stature, gluttonous: they will have many children, and little means: scratching their heads with both hands, they will pay no attention to the commands of their husbands or parents: they will be selfish, abject, and slatternly: they will be scolds and liars: they will be indecent and immoral in their conduct, and will ever attach themselves to dissolute men. Youths, although disregarding the rules of studentship, will study the Vedas. Householders will neither sacrifice nor practise becoming liberality. Anchorets will subsist upon food accepted from rustics; and mendicants will be influenced by regard for friends and associates[8]. Princes, instead of protecting will plunder their subjects; and, under the pretext of levying customs, will rob merchants of their property.

In the Kali age every one who has cars and elephants and steeds will be a Rājā[9]: every one who is feeble will be a slave. Vaiśyas will abandon agriculture and commerce, and gain a livelihood by servitude or the exercise of mechanical arts. Sūdras, seeking a subsistence by begging, and assuming, the outward marks of religious mendicants, will become the impure followers of impious and heretical doctrines[10].

Oppressed by famine and taxation, men will desert their native lands, and go to those countries which are fit for coarser grains.[11] The path of the Vedas being obliterated, and men having deviated into heresy, iniquity will flourish, and the duration of life will therefore decrease. In consequence of horrible penances not enjoined by scripture, and of the vices of the rulers, children will die in their infancy.

Women will bear children at the age of five, six, or seven years; and men beget them when they are eight, nine, or ten. A man will be grey when he is twelve; and no one will exceed twenty years of life.[12] Men will possess little sense, vigour, or virtue, and will therefore perish in a very brief period. In proportion as heresy extends, so, Maitreya, shall the progress of the Kali age be estimated by the wise.

In proportion as the number of the pious, who adhere to the lessons of the Vedas, diminishes–as the efforts of individuals who cultivate virtue relax– as the first of males becomes no longer the object of sacrifices– as respect for the teachers of the Vedas declines– and as regard is acknowledged for the diseminators of heresy– so may wise men note the augmented influence of the Kali age.[13]

In the Kali age, Maitreya, men, corrupted by unbelievers, will refrain from adoring Viṣṇu, the lord of sacrifice, the creator and lord of all; and will say, "Of what authority are the Vedas? what are gods or Brahmans? what need is there of purification with water?" Then will the clouds yield scanty rain: then will the corn be light in ear, and the grain will be poor, and of little sap: garments will be mostly made of the fibres, of the San:[14] the principal of trees will be the Sami[15]: the prevailing caste will be the Sūdra: millet will be the more common grain: the milk in use will be chiefly that of goats: unguents will be made of Usīra grass.

The mother and father-in-law will be venerated in place of parents; and a man's friends will be his brother-in-law, or one who has a wanton wife. Men will say, "Who has a father? who has a mother? each one is born according to his deeds:" and therefore they will look upon a wife's or husband's parents as their own. Endowed with little sense, men, subject to all the infirmities of mind, speech, and body, will daily commit sins; and everything that is calculated to afflict beings, vicious, impure, and wretched, will be generated in the Kali age.

Then shall some places follow a separate duty,[16] devoid of holy study, oblations of fire, and invocations of the gods.[17] Then, in the Kali age, shall a man acquire by a trifling exertion as much eminence in virtue as is the result of arduous penance in the Kṛta age, of purity.[18]

NOTES

1. Two kinds of great or universal dissolution are here intimated; one occurring at the end of a Kalpa, or day of Brahmā, to which the term Upasanhriti is applied in the text, and Ātyantika laya by the commentator; and the other taking place at the end of the life of Brahmā, which is termed a great or elemental dissolution: Mahā pralaya and Prākṛta pralaya.

2. These measures of time are more fully detailed in the first book: see Bk. I. Ch. III.

3. This is an allusion to a popular notion, originating probably with Manu: "In the Kṛta age the genius of truth and right stands firm on his four feet; but in the following ages he is deprived successively of one foot," etc. I. 81, 82.

4. 'Such an act is just what it is;' यासैव प्रायश्चित्तक्रिया कलौ। that is, it may be attended by inconvenience to the individual, but is utterly inefficacious for the expiation of sin.

5. Whether it is conformable or contradictory to the Vedas and the law. The passage may be rendered also, 'The doctrine or dogma of any one soever will be scripture.'

6. He will not part with the half of the half of half a Paṇa; that is, with ten Cowries; a Paṇa being equal to eighty Cowries, or small shells. Five Paṇas are equal to one Ānā, or the sixteenth of a Rupee; and, at two shillings the Rupee, ten Cowries are equal to about one-seventh of a farthing.

7. They will be valued for their individual use only, not from any notion of their generic sanctity.

8. The Bhāgavata has, "Religious students will be regardless of vows and purification; householders will beg, not give alms; anchorets will dwell in villages; and mendicants will be desirous of riches."

9. That is, princes and warriors will be so on longer by virtue of their birth and caste.

10. Most of the mendicant orders admit members without distinction of caste; but probably Buddhists especially are here intended. The Bhāgavata repeatedly alludes to the diffusion of heretical doctrines and practices, the substitution of outward signs and marks for devotion, and the abandonment of the worship of Viṣṇu. The Śaiva mendicant orders are probably those especially in view. The same probably are intended by our text in the subsequent allusion to unauthorized austerities, and sectarial marks.

11. 'Gavedhuka (Coix barbata) and other bad sorts of grain.' गवेधुकाकदान्नाद्यान् देशान्। Another reading is, गोधूमान् यवान्नाद्यान्। 'Countries growing wheat, barley and the like.' But to place wheat and barley amongst inferior grains, and to rank them lower than rice, is a classification that could have occurred to a native of Bengal alone.

12. The Vāyu says three and twenty; the Bhāgavata, from twenty to thirty.

13. The complaints of the prevalence of heterodox doctrines, and neglect of the practices of the Vedas, which recur in the Bhāgavata and our text, indicate a period of change in the condition of the Hindu religion, which it would be important to verify. If reference is made to Buddhism, to which in some respects the allusions especially apply, it would probably denote a period not long subsequent to the Christian era; but it is more likely to be of a later date, or in the eighth and ninth centuries, when Śankara is said to have reformed a variety of corrupt practices, and given rise to others, See As. Res. vol. XVI. p. 12.

14. Crotolaria juncea.

15. The silk cotton, Bambax heptaphylla.

16. The expression Kvacit-lokaḥ (क्वचिल्लोकः), 'a certain place', is explained by the commentator, Kīkaṭa, etc. (कीकटादौ); confirming the inference that Buddhism is especially aimed at in the previous passages; for Kīkaṭa, or south Behar, is the sense of Śākya's earliest and most successful labours.

17. Several of the Purāṇas contain allusions to the degeneracy of the Kali age, but none afford more copious details. The description in the Bhāgavata is much shorter; that of the Vāyu is much the same, and employs many of the same verses and illustrations.

18. This might be suspected of being said ironically, referring to what had been just observed of places where a religion prevailed that required neither study nor sacrifice. The commentator, however, understands it literally, and asserts that allusion is here made to the Vaiṣṇava faith, in which devotion to Viṣṇu or Kṛṣṇa, and the mere repetition of his names, are equally efficacious in the Kali age with the penances and sacrifices of the preceding ages: therefore he concludes the Kali, by this one property, is the best of all the ages: अनेनैकेन गुणेन कलिः सर्वश्रेष्ठः इत्यर्थः। This interpretation is confirmed by the following chapter.

It was once a matter of dispute amongst the sages, at what season the least moral merit obtained the greatest reward, and by whom it was most easily displayed. In order to terminate the discussion, they went to Veda Vyāsa to remove their doubts. They found the illustrious Muni, my son, half immersed in the water of the Ganges; and awaiting the close of his ablutions, the sages remained on the banks of the sacred stream, under shelter of a grove of trees. As my son plunged down into the water, and again rose up from it, the Munis heard him exclaim, "Excellent, is the Kali age!" Again he dived, and again rising, said in their hearing, "Well done, well done Śūdra; you are happy!" Again he sand down, and as he once more emerged they heard him say, "Well done, well done, women; they are happy! who are more fortunate than they?" After this, my son finished his bathing, and the sages met him as he approached to welcome them. After he had given them seats, and they had proffered their respects, the son of Satyavatī said to them, "On what account have you come to me?" They replied, "We came to you to consult you on a subject on which we entertain some doubt; but that may be at present suspended: explained to us something else. We heard you say, 'Excellent is the Kali age! Well done, Śūdra! Well done, women!' Now we are desirous to know why this was said, why you called them repeatedly happy. Tell us the meaning of it, if it be not a mystery. We will then propose to you the question that occupies our thoughts."

Being thus addressed by the Munis, Vyāsa smiled, and said to them, "Hear excellent sages, why I uttered the words 'Well done, well done.' The fruit of penance, of continence, of silent prayer, and the like, practised in the Kṛta age for ten years, in the Treta for one year, in the Dvāpara for a month, is obtained in the Kali age in a day and night: therefore did I exclaim, 'Excellent, excellent, is the Kali age!' That reward which a man obtains in the Kṛta by abstract meditation, in the Treta by sacrifice, in the Dvāpara by adoration, he receives in the Kali by merely reciting the name of Keśava. In the Kali age a man displays the most exalted virtue by every little exertion; therefore, pious sages, who know what virtue is, I was pleased with the Kali age. Formerly the Vedas were to be acquired by the twice-born through the diligent observances of self-denial; and it was their duty to celebrate sacrifices conformably to the ritual, Then idle prayers, idle feasts, and fruitless ceremonies, were practised but to mislead the twice-born; for although observed by them devoutly, yet, in consequence of some irregularity in their celebration, sin was incurred in all their works, and what they ate, or what they drank, did not effect the fulfilment of their desires. In all their objects the twice-born enjoyed no independence, and they attained their respective spheres only with exceeding pain. The Śūdra, on the contrary, more fortunate than they, reaches his assigned station by rendering them service, and performing merely the sacrifice of preparing food, in which no rules determine what may or may not be eaten, what may or may not be drunk. Therefore, most excellent sages, is the Śūdra fortunate.

"Riches are accumulated by men in modes not incompatible with their peculiar duties, and they are then to be bestowed upon the worthy, and expended in constant sacrifice. There is great trouble in their acquisition; and great grief for their loss. Thus, eminent Brāhmaṇas, through these and other sources of anxiety, men attain their allotted spheres of Prajāpati and the rest only by exceeding labour and suffering. This is not the case with women: a woman has only to honour her husband, in act, thought, and speech, to reach the same region to which he is elevated; and she thus accomplishes her object without any great exertion. This was the purport of my exclamation, 'Well done!' the third time. I have thus related to you what you asked. Now demand the question you came to put to me, in any way you please, and I will make you a distinct reply."

The Munis then said to Vyāsa, "The question we intended to have asked you has been already answered by you in your reply to our subsequent inquiry." On hearing which Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana laughed, and said to the holy persons who had come to see him, whose eyes were wide open with astonishment, "I perceived, with the eye of divine knowledge, the question you intended to ask, and in allusion to it I uttered the expressions, Well done, well done.' In truth, in the Kali age duty is discharged with very little trouble by mortals, whose faults are all washed away by the water of their individual merits; by Śūdras, through diligent attendance only upon the twice-born; and by women, through the slight effort of obedience to their husbands. Therefore, Brāhmaṇas, did I thrice express my admiration of their happiness; for in the Kṛta and other ages great were the toils of the regenerate to perform their duty. I waited not for your inquiry, but replied at once to the question you purposed to ask. Now, ye who know what virtue is, what else do you wish me to tell you?"

The Munis then saluted and praised Vyāsa, and, being freed by him from uncertainty, departed as they came. To you also, excellent Maitreya, have I imparted this secret, this one great virtue of the otherwise vicious Kali age. The dissolution of the world, and the aggregation of the elements, I will now describe to you.[1]

NOTES

1. The illustration of the efficacy of devotion to Viṣṇu given in this chapter is peculiar to this Purāṇa, but the doctrine is common to it and the Bhāgavata. It is repeatedly inculcated in that work. The paralled passage in the twelfth book is the following. "Puruṣottama, abiding in the hearts of men, takes away all the sins of the Kali age, produced by place or property. Bhagavān, abiding in the heart, the heard, repeated, read of, worshipped, or honoured, dissipates the ills of men for ten thousand births. As fire, entering into the substance of gold, purifies it from the allows with which it is debased in the mine, so Viṣṇu, united with the devotee, is the refiner from all that is evil. By learning, penance, suppression of breath, friendship, pilgrimage, ablution, mortification, gifts, prayer, the soul attains not that exceeding purity which it derives from the presence of Viṣṇu. Therefore, with all your soul, O king, hold Keśava ever present in your heart. Let one about to die be most careful in this; for so he goes to supreme felicity. Let the name of the supreme god, Viṣṇu, be repeated diligently by all in their last moments; for he who desires liberation shall attain it by the frequent repetition of the name of Kṛṣṇa. Final felicity is derived in the Kṛta age from holy study; in the Treta, from religious rites. In the Dvāpara it is attained by pious services; but in the Kali age it is secured by repeating the name of Hari." Similar doctrines are taught in the Giṭa, and other Vaiṣṇava works. See As. Res. vol. XVI. p. 116.

The dissolution of existing beings is of three kinds, incidental, elemental and absolute[1]. The incidental is that which relates to Brahmā, and occurs at the end of a Kalpa: the elemental is that which takes place after two Parārddhas: the absolute is final liberation from existence.

Parāśara continued– A Parārddha, Maitreya, is that number which occurs in the eighteenth place of figures, enumerated according to the rule of decimal notation[3]. At the end of twice that period elemental dissolution occurs, when all the discrete products of nature are withdrawn into their indiscrete source. The shortest period of time is a Mātrā, which is equal to the twinkling of the human eye. Fifteen Mātrās make a Kāṣṭhā; thirty Kāṣṭhās, one Kalā; fifteen Kalās, one Nāḍikā. A Nāḍikā is ascertained by a measure of water, with a vessel made of twelve Palas and a half of copper, in the bottom of which there is to be a hole made with a tube of gold, of the weight of four Māṣas, and four inches long[4]. According to the Māgadha measure, the vessel should hold a Prastha (or sixteen Palas) of water. Two of these Nādīs make one Muhūrtta; thirty of which are one day and night. Thirty such periods form a month; twelve months make a year, or a day and night of the gods; and three hundred and sixty such days constitute a year of the celestials. An aggregate of four ages contains twelve thousand divine years; and a thousand periods of four ages complete a day of Brahmā. That period is also termed a Kalpa, during which fourteen Manus preside; and at the end of it occurs the incidental or Brahmā dissolution.

The nature of this dissolution is very fearful: hear me describe it, as well as that which takes place at the elemental dissolution, which I will also relate to you.

At the end of a thousand periods of four ages the earth is for the most part exhausted. A total dearth then ensues, which lasts a hundred years; and, in consequence of the failure of food, all beings become languid and exanimate, and at last entirely perish. The eternal Viṣṇu then assumes the character of Rudra, the destroyer, and descends to reunite all his creatures with himself. He enters into the seven rays of the sun,[5] drinks up all the waters of the globe, and causes all moisture whatever, in living bodies or in the soil, to evaporate; thus drying up the whole earth. The seas, the rivers, the mountain torrents, and springs, are all exhalled; and so are all the waters of Pātāla, the regions below the earth. Thus fed, through his intervention, with abundant moisture, the seven solar rays dilate to seven suns[6], whose radiance glows above, below and on every side, and sets the three worlds and Pātāla on fire. The three worlds, consumed by these suns, become rugged and deformed throughout the whole extent of their mountains, rivers, and seas; and the earth, bare of verdure, and destitute of moisture, alone remains, resembling in appearance the bank of a tortoise.

The destroyer of all things, Hari, in the form of Rudra, who is the flame of time, becomes the scorching breath of the serpent Śeṣa, and thereby reduces Pātāla to ashes. The great fire, when it has burnt all the divisions of Pātāla, proceeds to the earth, and consumes it also. A vast whirlpool of eddying flame then spreads to the region of the atmosphere, and the sphere of the gods, and wraps them in ruin. The three spheres show like a frying-pan amidst the surrounding flames, that prey upon all moveable or stationary things. The inhabitants of the two upper spheres, having discharged their functions, and being annoyed by the heat, remove to the sphere above, or Maharloka. When that becomes heated, its tenants, who after the full period of their stay are desirous of ascending to higher regions, depart for the Janaloka[7].

Janārddana, in the person of Rudra, having consumed the whole world, breathes forth heavy clouds; and those called Samvartta, resembling vast elephants in bulk, overspread the sky, roaring, and darting lightenings. इति श्रीविष्णु पुराणे षष्ठांशे तृतीयः अध्यायः।

Such are these massy clouds in hue: in form some resemble towns, some mountains, some are like houses and hovels, and some are like columns. Mighty in size, and loud in thunder, they fill all space. Showering down torrents of water, these clouds quench the dreadful fires which involve the three worlds, and then they rain uninterruptedly for a hundred years, and delung the whole world. Pouring down in drops as large as dice, these rains overspread the earth, and fill the middle region, and inundate heaven. The world is now enveloped in darkness, and all things, animate or inanimate, having perished, the clouds continue to pour down their waters for more than a hundred years.

1. The first is called Naimittaka, 'occasional' or 'incidental' or Brāhmya, as occasioned by the intervals of Brahmā's days; the destruction of creatures, though not of the substance of the world, occurring during his night. The general resolution of the elements into their primitive source, or Prakṛti, is the Prākṛtika destruction, and occurs at the end of Brahmā's life. The third, the absolute or final. Ātyantika, is individual annihilation; Mokṣa, exemption for ever from future existence. The Bhāgavata here notices the fourth kind, of which mention occurred in a preceding passage (Bk. I. Ch. III). Nitya or constant dissolution; explaining it to be the imperceptible change that all things suffer in the various stages of growth and decay, life and death. The various conditions of beings subject to change are occasioned by that constant dissolution of life which is rapidly produced by the resistless stream of time, taking every thing perpetually aways: कालस्रोतसोजवेनाशु ह्रियमाणस्य नित्यदा परिणामिनामवस्थास्ताः जन्मप्रलयहेतवः। The Vāyu describes but three kinds of Pralaya, omitting the Nitya.

2. Maitreya has a rather indifferent memory (see Bk. I. Ch. III); but the periods specified in the two places do not agree. In the first book two Parārddhas, as equal to one hundred years of Brahmā, are 311,040, 000,000,000 years of mortals.

3. Counting according to this mode of enumeration, a Parārdha is represented by 100,000,000,000,000,000. The Vāyu Purāṇa has a term for each of these decimal values. Daśa (दश), 10; Śatam (शतं), 100; Sahasram (सहस्रं), 1000; Ayutam (अयुतं), 10,000; Niyutam (नियुतं), 100,000; Prayutam (प्रयुतं), 1,000,000; Arvudam (अर्वुदं), 10,000,000; Nyurvudam (न्युर्वुदं), 100,000,000;Vrindam (वृन्दं), 1000,000,000; Param (परं), 10,000,000,000; Kharvam (खर्वं), 100,000,000,000; Nikharvam (निखर्वं),1000,000,000,000; Śankham (शंखं), 10,000,000,000,000; Padmam (पद्मं), 100,000,000,000,000; Samudram (समुद्रं), 1000,000,000,000; Madhyamam (मध्यमं), 10,000,000,000,000,000; Parārddham (परार्द्धं), 100,000,000,000,000,000. In the first book the Parārddham, as the half of Brahmā's life, it but 155,520,000,000,000 fifteen instead of eighteen places of figures.

4. The description of the Clepsydra is very brief, and wanting in precision. One of the commentaries is more explicit: 'A vessel made of twelve Palas and half of copper, and holding a Prastha, Māgadha measure, of water, broad at top, and having at bottom a tube of gold of four Māshas weight, four fingers long, is placed in water, and the time in which the vessel is filled by the whole in the bottom is called a Nāḍika:' सार्द्धद्वादशपलताम्नमयं मागधप्रस्थसम्मितं ऊर्द्धायतं पात्रं चतुर्माषचतुरङ्गुलहेम शलाकया कृताषच्छिद्रं जलेस्थापितं तेनच्छिद्रेण यावता कालेन युर्य्यते तावत्कालो नाडिकेति। The term Śalākā generally means a needle or stake, but it must here denote a pipe. The common measure of the Nāḍi is a thin shallow brass cup, with a small hole in the bottom. It is placed on the surface of water, in a large vessel, where nothing can disturb it, and where the water gradually fills the cup, and sinks it. As. Res. vol. V. p. 87.

5. See Bk. II. Ch. XI. n. 3.

6. These also have their several appellations: the commentator quotes the Vedas as the authority; Ārāga, Bhrāja, Paṭala, Pataṅga, Svamābhāk, Jyotiṣ mat, and Savibhāsa.

7. The passage may also be understood. 'Those go to Janaloka who are desirous of obtaining Brahma, or final liberation, through the ten stages of perfection– devotion, penance, truth, etc.' In the Vāyu Purāṇa more details are specified. Those sainted mortals who have diligently worshipped Viṣ ṇu, and are distinguished for piety, abide, at the time of dissolution, in Maharloka, with the Pitṛs, the Manus, the seven Ṛṣis, the various orders of celestial spirits, and the gods. These, when the heat of the flames that destroy the worlds reaches to Maharloka, repair to Janaloka in their subtile forms, destined to become re-embodied, in similar capacities as their former, when the world is renewed, at the beginning of the succeeding Kalpa. This continues throughout the life of Brahmā; at the expiration of his life all are destroyed: but those who have then attained a residence in the Brahmaloka, by having identified themselves in spirit with the supreme, are finally resolved into the sole-existing Brahma.

When the waters have reached the region of the seven Ṛṣis, and the whole of the three worlds is one ocean, they stop. The breath of Viṣṇu becomes a strong wind, which blows for more than a hundred years, until all the clouds are dispersed. The wind is then reabsorbed, and he of whom all things are made, the lord by whom all things exist, he who is inconceivable, without beginning of the universe, reposes, sleeping upon Śeṣa, in the midst of the deep.

निमित्तं तत्र यच्छेते ब्रह्मरूपधरो हरिः॥७॥

The creator, Hari, sleeps upon the ocean, in the form of Brahma– glorified by Sanaka and the saints who had gone to the Janaloka, and contemplated by the holy inhabitants of Brahmaloka, anxious for final liberation– involved in mystic slumber, the celestial personification of his own illusions, and meditating on his own ineffable spirit, which is called Vāsudeva. This, Maitreya, is the dissolution termed incidental, because Hari, in the form of Brahmā, sleep there, as its incidental cause.

When the universal spirit wakes, the world revives; when he closes his eyes, all things fall upon the bed of mystic slumber. In like manner as a thousand great ages constitute a day of Brahmā, so his night consists of the same period; during which the world is submerged by a vast ocean. Awaking at the end of his night, the unborn, Viṣṇu, in the character of Brahmā, creates the universe anew, in the manner formerly related to you[1].

I have thus described to you the intermediate dissolution of the world, occurring at the end of every Kalpa. I will now, Maitreya, describe to you elemental dissolution. When by dearth and fire all the worlds and Pātālas are withered up and the modifications of Mahat and other products of nature are by all the will of Kṛṣṇa destroyed, the progress of elemental dissolution is begun.

Then, first, the waters swallow up the property of earth, which is the rudiment of smell; and earth, deprived of its property, proceeds to destruction. Devoid of the rudiment of odour, the earth becomes one with water. The waters then being much augmented, roaring, and rushing along, fill up all space, whether agitated or still. When the universe is thus pervaded by the waves of the watery element, its rudimental flavour is licked up by the element of fire, and, in consequence of the destruction of their rudiments, the waters themselves are destroyed. Deprived of the essential rudiment of flavour, they become one with fire, and the universe is therefore entirely filled with flame, which drinks up the water on every side, and gradually overspreads the whole of the world. While space is enveloped in flame, above, below, and all around, the element of wind seizes upon the rudimental property, or form, which is the cause of light; and that being withdrawn, all becomes of the nature of air.

The rudiment of form being destroyed, and fire deprived of its rudiment, air extinguishes fire, and spreads resistlessly over space, which is deprived of light when fire merges into air. Air then, accompanied by sound, which is the source of ether, extends every where throughout the ten regions of space, until ether seizes upon contact, its rudimental property; by the loss of which, air is destroyed, and ether remains unmodified: devoid of form, flavour, touch, and smell, it exists unembodied and vast, and pervades the whole of space, Ether, whose characteristic property and rudiment is sound, exists alone, occupying all the vacuity of space. But then the radical elements egotism devours sound, and all the elements and faculties are at once merged into their original.

This primary element is consciousness, combined with the property of darkness, and is itself swallowed up by Mahat, whose characteristic property is intelligence; and earth and Mahat are the inner and outer boundaries of the universe. In this manner, as in the creation were the seven forms of nature (Prakṛti), reckoned from Mahat to earth[2], so, at the time of elemental dissolution, these seven successively re-enter into each other.

The egg of Brahmā is dissolved in the waters that surround it, with its seven zones, seven oceans, seven regions, and their mountains. The investure of water is drunk up by fire; the stratum of fire is absorbed by that of air: air blends itself with ether: the primary element of egotism devours the ether, and is itself taken up by intellect, which, along with all these, is seized upon by nature (Prakṛti). Equilibrium of the three properties, without excess or deficiency, is called nature Prakṛti, origin (Hetu), the chief principle (Pradhāna), cause (Kāraṇa), supreme (Param).

स विष्णुः सर्वमेवेदं यतो नावर्त्तते यतिः॥ ३८॥

This Prakṛti is essentially the same, whether discrete or indiscrete; only that which is discrete is finally lost or absorbed in the indiscrete. Spirit also, which is one, pure, imperishable, eternal, all-pervading, is a portion of that supreme spirit which is all things. That spirit which is other than (embodied) spirit, in which there are no attributes of name, species, or the like– which is one with all wisdom, and is to be understood as sole existence– that is Brahma, infinite glory, supreme spirit, supreme power, Viṣṇu, all that is; from whence the perfect sage returns no more.

विष्णुर्नाम्ना स वेदेषु वेदान्तेषु च गीयते॥ ४०॥

Nature (Prakṛti), which I have described to you as being essentially both discrete and indiscrete, and spirit (which is united with body), both resolve into supreme spirit. Supreme spirit is the upholder of all things, and the ruler of all things, and is glorified in the Vedas and in the Vedanta by the name of Viṣṇu.

प्रवृत्तञ्च निवृत्तञ्च द्विविधं कर्म वैदिकम्।

ज्ञानात्मा ज्ञानयोगेन ज्ञानमूर्त्तिः स चेज्यते।
निवृत्ते योगिभिर्मार्गे विष्णुर्मुक्तिफलप्रदः॥ ४३॥

Works, as enjoined by the Vedas, are of two kinds, active (Pravritta) and quiescent (Nivṛtta); by both of which the universal person is worshipped by mankind. He, the lord of sacrifice, the male of sacrifice, the most excellent male, is worshipped by men in the active mode by rites enjoined in the Ṛk, Yajur and Sāma Vedas. The soul of wisdom, the person of wisdom, Viṣṇu, and giver of emancipation, is worshipped by sages in the quiescent form, through meditative devotion.

व्यक्ताव्यक्तात्मिका तस्मिन् प्रकृतिः सम्प्रलीयते।
पुरुषश्चापि मैत्रेय! व्यापिन्यव्याहतात्मनि॥ ४६॥

The exhaustless Viṣṇu is whatever thing that is designated by long, short, or prolated syllables, or that which is without a name. He is that which is discrete, and that which is indiscrete: he is exhaustless spirit, supreme spirit, universal spirit, Hari, the wearer of universal forms. Nature, whether discrete or indiscrete, is absorbed into him, and (detached) spirit also merges into the all-diffusive and unobstructed spirit.

The period of two Parārddhas, as I have described it to you, Maitreya, is called a day of that potent Viṣṇu; and whilst the products of nature are merged into their source, nature into spirit, and that into the supreme, that period is termed his night, and is of equal duration with his day. But, in fact, to that eternal supreme spirit there is neither day nor night, and these distinctions are only figuratively applied to the almighty.

I have thus explained to you the nature of elemental dissolution, and will now expound to you which is final[3].

NOTES

1. The Naimittika Pralaya is described in the Vāyu, Bhāgavata. Kūrma, and other Purāṇas, to the same effect, and very commonly in precisely the same words.

2. See Bk. I. Ch. II.

3. The Bhāgavata notices the Prākṛta pralaya much more briefly, and it is omitted in the Vāyu.

The wise man having investigated the three kinds of worldly pain, or mental and bodily affliction and the like[1], and having acquired true wisdom, and detachment from human objects, obtains final dissolution. The first to the three pains, or Ādhyātmika, is of two kinds, bodily and mental. Bodily pain is of many kinds, as you shall hear. Affections of the head, catarrh, fever, cholic, fistula, spleen, haemorrhoids, intumescence, sickness, ophthalmia, dysentery, leprosy, and many other discases, constitute bodily affliction. Mental sufferings are love, anger, fear, hate, covetousness, stupefaction, despair, sorrow, malice, disdain, jealousy, envy, and many other passions which are engendered in the mind, These and various other afficitions, mental or corporeal, are comprised under the class of worldly sufferings, which is called Ādhyātmika (natural and inseparable). That pain to which excellent Brahman, the term Ādhibhautika (natural, but incidental) is applied, is every kind of evil which is inflicted (from without) upon men by beasts, birds, men, goblins, snakes, fiends, or reptiles; and the pain that is termed Ādhidaivika (or superhuman) is the work of cold, heat, wind, rain, lightning and other (atmospherical phenomena). Affliction, Maitreya, is multiplied in thousands of shapes in the progress of conception, birth, decay, disease, death and hell.

The tender (and subtle) animal exists in the embryo, surrounded by abundant filth, floating in water, and distorted in its back, neck, and bones; enduring severe pain even in the course of its development, as disordered by the acid, acrid, bitter, pungent, and saline articles of its mother's food; incapable of extending or contracting its limbs; reposing amidst the slime of ordure and urine; every way incommoded; unable to breathe; endowed with consciousness, and calling to memory many hundred previous births. Thus exists the embryo in profound affliction, bound to the world by its former works.

When the child is about to be born, its face is besmeared by excremcnt, urine, blood, mucus, and semen; its attachment to the uterus is ruptured by the Prājāpati wind; it is turned head downwards, and violently expelled from the womb by the powerful and painful winds of parturition; and the infant losing for a time all sensation, when brought in contact with the external air, is immediately dcprived of its intellectual knowledge. Thus born, the child is tortured in every limb, as if pierced with thorns, or cut to pieces with a saw, and falls from its fetid lodgment, as from a sore, like a crawling thing upon the earth. Unable to feel itself, unable to turn itself, it is dependent upon the will of others for being bathed and nourished.

Laid upon a dirty bed, it is bitten by insects and mosquitoes, and has not power cr to drive them away. Many are the pangs attending birth, and many are those which succeed to birth; and many are the sufferings which are inflicted by elemental and superhuman agency in the state of childhood.

कोऽधर्म्मः कश्च वै धर्मः कस्मिन् वर्त्तेत वा कथम्।
किं कर्त्तव्यकर्त्तव्यं किं वा किं गुणदोषवत्॥ २३॥

Enveloped by the gloom of ignorance, and internally bewildered, man knows not whence he is, who he is, whither he goes, nor what is his nature; by what bonds he is bound; what is cause, and what is not cause ; what is to be done and what is to be left undone; what is to be said, and what is to be kept silent; what is righteousness, what is iniquity; in what it consists, or how; what is right, what is wrong, what is virtue, what is vice.

नरकं कर्मणां लोपात् फलमाहुर्महर्षयः।
तस्मादज्ञानिनां दुःखमिह चामुत्र चोत्तमम्॥ २६॥

Thus man, like a brute beast, addicted only to animal gratifications, suffers the pain that ignorance occasions. Ignorance, darkness, inactivity, influence those devoid of knowledge, so that pious works are neglected; but hell is the consequence of neglect of religious acts, according to the great sages, and the ignorant therefore suffcr affliction both in this world and in the next.

When old age arrives, the body is infirm; the limbs are relaxed; the face is emaciate and shrivelled; the skin is wrinkled, and scantily covers the veins and sinews; the eye discerns not afar off, and the pupil gazes on vacuity; the nostrils are stuffed with hair; the trunk trembles as it moves; the bones appear beneath the surface, the back is bowed, and the joints are bent; the digestive fire is extinct, and here is little appetite and little vigour; walking, rising, sleeping, sitting, are all painful efforts; the ear is dull; the eye is dim; the mouth is disgusting with dribbling saliva; the senses no longer are obedient to the will; and as death approaches, the things that are perceived even are immediately forgotten.

The utterance of a single sentence is fatiguing, the wakefulness is perpetuated by difficult breathing, coughing, and painful exhaustion. The old man is lifted up by somebody else; he is clothed by somebody else; he is an object of contempt to his servants, his children, and his wife. Incapable of cleanliness, of amusement, or food, or desire, he is laughed at by his dependants, and disregarded by his kin; and dwelling on the exploits of his youth, as on the actions of a past life, he sighs deeply, and is sorely distressed. Such are some of the pains which old age is condemned to suffer. I will now describe to you the agonies of death.

The neck droops; the feet and hands are relaxed; the body trembles; the man is repeatedly exhausted, subdued, and visited with interrupted knowledge; the principle of selfishness afflicts him, and he thinks what will become of my wealth, my lands, my children, my wife, my servants, my house? The joints of his limbs are tortured with severe pains, as if cut by a saw, or as if they were pierced by the sharp arrows of the destroyer; he rolls his eyes, and tosses about his hands and feet; his lips and palate are parched and dry, and his throat, obstructed by foul humours and deranged vital airs, emits a rattling sound; he is afflicted with burning heat, and with thirst, and with hunger; and he at last passes away, tortured by the servants of the judge of the dead, to undergo a renewal of his sufferings in another body. These are the agonies which men have to endure when they die. I will now describe to you the tortures which they suffer in hell.

Men are bound, when they die, by the servants of the king of Tartarus with cords, and beaten with sticks, and have then to encounter the fierce aspect of Yama, and the horrors of their terrible route. In the different hells there are various intolerable tortures with burning sand, fire, machines, and weapons; some are served with saws, some roasted in forges, some arc chopped with axes, some buried in the ground, some are mounted on stakes, some cast to wild beasts to be devoured, some are gnawed by vultures, some torn by tigers, some are boiled in oil, some rolled in caustic slime, some are precipitated from great heights, some tossed upwards by engines. The number of punishments inflicted in hell, which are the consequences of sin, is infinite[2].

But not in hell alone do the souls of the deceased undergo pain: there is no cessation even in heaven; for its temporary inhabitant is ever tormented with the prospect of descending again to earth. Again is he liable to conception and to birth; he is merged again into the embryo, and repairs to it when about to be born; then he dies, as soon as born, or in infancy, or in youth, or in manhood, or in old age. Death, sooner or later, is inevitable.

As long as he lives he is immersed in manifold afflictions, like the seed of the cotton amidst the down that is to be spun into thread. In acquiring, losing, and preserving wealth there are many griefs; and so there are in the misfortunes of our friends. Whatever is produced that is cost acceptable to man, that, Maitreya, becomcs a sccd whence springs the tree of sorrow.

Wife, children, servants, house, lands, riches, contribute much more to the misery than to the happiness of mankind. Where could man, scorched by the fires of the sun of this world, look for felicity, were it not for the shade afforded by the tree of emancipation? Attainment of the divine being is considered by the wise as the remedy of the threefold class of ills that beset the different stages of life, conception, birth, and decay, as characterized by that only happiness which effacts all other kinds of felicity, however abundant, and as being absolute and final[3].

It should therefore be the assiduous endeavour of wise men to attain unto god[4]. The means of such attainment are said, great Muni, to be knowledge and works. Knowledge is of two kinds, that which is derived from scripture, and that which is derived from reflection. Brahma that is the word is composed of scripture; Brahma that is supreme is produced of reflection[4]. Ignorance is utter darkness, in which knowledge, obtained through any sense (as that of hearing), shines like a lamp; but the knowledge that is derived from reflection breaks upon the obscurity like the sun.

परया त्वक्षरप्राप्तिरृग्वेदादिमयापरा॥ ६५॥

What has been said by Manu, when appealing to the meaning of the Vedas with respect to this subject, I will repeat to you. There are two (forms of) spirit (or god), the spirit which is the word, and the spirit which is supreme. He who is thoroughly imbued with the word of god obtains supreme spirit[5]. The Atharva Veda also states that there are two kinds of knowledge; by the one, which is the supreme, god is attained; the other is that which consists of the Ṛk and other Vedas[6].

श्रुतिवाक्योदितं सूक्ष्मं तद्विष्णोः परमं पदम्॥ ६८॥

That which is imperceptible, undecaying, inconceivable, unborn, inexhaustible, indescribable; which has neither form, nor hands, nor feet; which is almighty, omnipresent, eternal; the cause of all things, and without cause; permeating all, itself unpenetrated and from which all things proceed; that is the object which the wise behold, that is Brahma, that is the supreme state, that is the subject of contemplation to those who desire liberation, that is the thing spoken of by the Vedas, the infinitely subtile, supreme condition of Viṣṇu.

तदेव भगवद्वाच्यं स्वरूपं परमात्मनः।

ज्ञायते येन तज्ज्ञानं परमन्यत् त्रयीमयम्॥ ७०॥

That essence of the supreme is defined by the term Bhagavat[8]: the word Bhagavat is the denomination of that primeval and eternal god: and he who fully understands the meaning of that expression, is possessed of holy wisdom, the sum and substance of the three Vedas.

सम्भर्त्तेति तथा भर्त्ता भकारोऽर्थद्वयान्वितः।
नेता गमयिता स्रष्टा गकारार्थस्तथा मुनि॥ ७३॥

The word Bhagavat is a convenient form to be used in the adoration of that supreme being, to whom no term is applicable; and therefore Bhagavat expresses that supreme spirit, which is individual, almighty, and the cause of causes of all things. The letter Bh implies the cherishes and supporter of the universe. By ga is understood the leader, impeller, or creator.

भगवच्छब्दवाच्यानि विना हेयैर्गुणादिभिः॥७९॥

The dissyllable Bhaga indicates the six properties, dominion, might, glory, splendour, wisdom and dispassion. The purport of the letter va is that elemental spirit in which all beings exist, and which exists in all beings[9]. And thus this great word Bhagavan is the name of Vāsudeva, who is one with the supreme Brahma, and of no one else. This word therefore, which is the general denomination of an adorable object, is not used in reference to the supreme in a general, but a special signification. When applied to any other (thing or person) it is used in its customary or general import. In the latter case it may purport one who knows the origin and end and revolutions of beings, and what is wisdom, what ignorance. In the former it denotes wisdom, energy, power, dominion, might, glory, without end, and without defect.

The term Vāsudeva means that all beings abide in that supreme beings, and that he abides in all beings[10], as was formerly explained by Keśidhvaja to Khāṇḍikya, called Janaka, when he inquired of him an explanation of the name of the immortal, Vāsudeva, He said, "He dwells internally in all beings, and all things dwell in him; and thence the lord Vāsudeva is the creator and preserver of the world. He, though one with all beings, is beyond and separate from material nature (Prakṛti), from its products, from properties, from imperfections: he is beyond all investing substance: he is universal soul; all the interstices of the universe are filled up by him: he is one with all good qualities; and all created beings are endowed with but a small portion of his individuality. Assuming at will various forms, he bestows benefits on the whole world, which was his work.

Glory, might, dominion, wisdom, energy, power, and other attributes, are collected in him. Supreme of the supreme, in whom no imperfections abide, lord over finite and infinite, god in individuals and universals, visible and invisible, omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient, almighty. The wisdom, perfect, pure, supreme, undefiled, and one only, by which he is conceived contemplated, and known, that is wisdom; all else is ignorance."

NOTES

1. The three kinds of affliction, inseparable, incidental and superhuman, are fully described in the commentary on the first verse of the Sānkhya Kārikā in a similar strain as that which is adopted in the text.

2. Some further particulars of the different hells, and the punishments inflicted in them, have been given before : see Bk. I. Ch. XIV.

3. All this is conformable to the Sāṁkhya doctrines in particular, although the same spirit pervades all Hindu metaphysics.

4. Tasmāt Tat prāptaye yatna kartavya paṇḍitairnaraiḥ (तस्मात् तत्प्राप्त्ये यत्नः कर्त्तव्यः पण्डितैर्नरैः). The expression Tat Prāptaye, 'for the obtaining of that,' refers to the phrase immediately preceding, Bhagavatprāpti, 'obtaining of,' or 'attaining to, Bhagavat,' the lord.

5. Brahma is of two kinds; Sabda-Brahma, spirit or god to be attained through the word, that is, the Vedas and the duties they prescribe; and Para-Brahma, spirit or god to be attained through reflection, by which the difference between soul and matter is ascertained.

6. This seems intended as a quotation from Manu, but it has not been found in the code; it is द्वे ब्रह्माणि वेदितव्ये शब्दब्रह्म परचं यत्। शब्द ब्रह्मणि निष्णातः परं ब्रह्माधिगच्छति।

7. The commentator quotes other passages from the Vedas of a similar tendency, intimating, however, the necessity of performing acts prior to attaining knowledge; as, कषाये कर्म्मभिः पक्वे ततो ज्ञानं तु परमागतिः। 'The decoction (preparatory process) being digested by rites, thereafter knowledge is the supreme resource.' अविद्ययामृत्युं तीर्त्वा विद्ययामृतमश्नुते। 'Having crossed the gulf of death by ignorance (ceremonial acts), man obtains immortality by (holy) knowledge.'

8. According to the comment, allusion is here made to the twelve syllable Mantra, or mystic for mula addressed to Viṣṇu: "Om Bhagavate Vāsudevāya namah; 'Om! salutation to Bhagavat Vāsudeva:' the repetition of which, by those devoted (bhakta) to Viṣṇu, is the easy mode of securing their liberation." The mysticism is, however, no doubt older than the worship of Viṣṇu; and the term Bhagavat is defined in the text according to the interpretation of the Vedas.

9. The commentator says these interpretations are from the Nirukta, the glossary of the Vedas. The more etymological derivation of the term is, Bhaga, 'power,' 'authority', and vat possessive affix.

10. From the root Vas (वस), 'abiding,' 'dwelling.' See Bk. I. Chs. I and II.

CHAPTER 6

षष्ठोऽध्यायः

(केशिध्वज-खाण्डिक्ययोर्विवरणम्)

पराशर उवाच

Parāśara said– He, Puruṣottama, is also known by holy study and devout meditation; and either, as the cause of attaining him, is entitled Brahma. From study let a man proceed to meditation, and from meditation to study[1]; by perfection in both supreme spirit becomes manifest. Study is one eye wherewith to behold it, and meditation is the other: he who is one with Brahma sees not with the eye of flesh.

Parāśara said– I will repeat to you, Maitreya, the explanation formerly given by Keśidhwaja to the magnanimous Khāṇḍikya, also called Janaka.

Parāśara said– There was Janaka, named Dharmadhwaja, who had two sons, Amitadhwaja and Kṛtadhwaja; and the latter was a king ever intent upon existent supreme spirit: his son was the celebrated Keśidhwaja. The son of Amitadhwaja was Janaka, called Khāndikya[2]. Khāṇḍikya was diligent in the way of works, and was renewed on earth for religious rites. Keśidhwaja, on the other hand, was endowed with spiritual knowledge. These two were engaged in hostilities, and Khāṇḍikya was driven from his principality by Keśidhwaja. Expelled from his dominions, he wandered with a few followers, his priest and his counsellors, amidst woods and mountains, where, destitute of true wisdom, he performed many sacrifices, expecting thereby to obtain divine truth, and to escape from death by ignorance[3].

Once whilst the best of those who are skilled in devotion, Keśidhwaja, was engaged in devout exercises, a fierce tiger slew his milch cow[4] in the lonely forest. When the Rājā heard that the cow had been killed, he asked the ministering priests what form of penance would expiate the crime.

ते चोचुर्न वयं विद्मः कशेरुः पृच्छ्यतामिति।

They replied that they did not know, and referred him to Kaśeru. Kaśeru when the Rājā consulted him, told him that he knew not, but that Śunaka would be able to tell him. Accordingly the Rājā went to Śunaka, but he replied, "I am as unable, great king, to answer your question as Kaśeru has been; and there is no one now upon earth who can give you the information except your enemy Khāṇḍikya, whom you have conquered."

स चाहं तं प्रयाम्येष प्रष्टुमात्मरिपुं मुने।

ततश्चाविकलो यागो मुनिश्रेष्ठ! भविष्यति॥१९॥

Upon receiving this answer, Keśidwaja said, "I will go, then, and pay a visit to my foe: if he kill me, no matter, for then I shall obtain the reward that attends being killed in a holy cause; if, on the contrary, he tell me that penance to perform, then my sacrifice will be unimpaired in efficacy."

Parāśara continued– Accordingly he ascended his car, having clothed himself in the deer skin (of the religious student), and went to the forest where the wise Khāṇḍikya resided. When Khāṇḍikya beheld him approach, his eyes reddened with rage, and he took up his bow, and said to him,

Khāṇḍikya said– "You have armed yourself with the deer skin to accomplish my destruction, imagining that in such an attire you will be safe from me; but, fool, the deer, upon whose backs this skin is seen, are slain by you and me with sharp arrows: so will I slay you; you shall not go free whilst I am living. You are an unprincipled felon, who have robbed me of my kingdom, and are deserving of death."

केशिध्वज उवाच

To this Keśidhwaja answered, "I have come hither, Khāṇḍikya, to ask you to solve my doubts, and not with any hostile intention: lay aside therefore both your arrow and your anger."

Parāśara said– Thus spoken to, Khāṇḍikya retired a while with his counsellors and his priest, and consulted with them what course to pursue. They strongly urged him to slay Keśidhwaja, who was now in his power, and by whose death he would again become the monarch of the whole earth. Khaṇḍikya replied to them, "It is no doubt true that by such an act I should become the monarch of the whole earth: he, however, would thereby conquer the world to come; whilst the earth would be mine. Now if I do not kill him, I shall subdue the next world, and leave him this earth. It seems to me that this world is not of more value then the next; for the subjugation of the next world endures for ever; the conquest over this is but for a brief season. I will therefore not kill him, but tell him what he wishes to know."

Returning then to Keśidhwaja, Khāṇḍikya desired him to propose his question, which he promised to answer; and Keśidhwaja related to him what had happened, the death of the cow, and demanded to know what penance he should perform. Khāṇḍikya, in reply, explained to him fully the expiation that was suited to the occasion; and Keśidhwaja then, with his permission, returned to the place of sacrifice, and regularly fulfilled every necessary act. Having completed the ceremony, with its supplementary rites, Keśidhwaja accomplished all his objects: but he then reflected thus: The priests whom I invited to attend have all been duly honoured; all those who had any request to make have been gratified by compliance with their desires; all that is proper for this world has been effected by me: why then should my mind feel as if my duty had been unfulfilled?" So meditating, he remembered that he had not presented to Khāṇḍikya the gift that it is becoming to offer to a spiritual preceptor, and, mounting his chariot, he immediately set off to the thick forest where that sage abode. Khāṇḍikya, upon his reappearance, assumed his weapons to kill him; but Keśidhwaja exclaimed, "Forbear, venerable sage. I not here to injure you, Khāṇḍikya: dismiss your wrath, and know that I have come hither to offer you that remuneration which is due to you as my instructor. Through your lessons I have fully completed my sacrifice, and I am therefore desirous to give you a gift. Demand what it shall be."

Khāṇḍikya having once more commenced with his counsellors, told them the purpose of his rival's visit, and asked them what he should demand. His friends recommended him to require his whole kingdom back again, as kingdoms are obtained by prudent men without conflicting hosts. The reflecting king Khāṇḍikya laughed, and replied to them, "Why should a person such as I be desirous of a temporary earthly kingdom? Of a truth you are able counsellors in the concerns of this life, but of those of the life to come you are assuredly ignorant."

So speaking, he went back to Keśidhwaja, and said to him, "Is it true that you wish to make me a gift, as to your preceptor?" "Indeed I do," answered Keśidhwaja. "Then," rejoined Khāṇḍikya, "as it is known that you are learned in the spiritual learning that teaches the doctrine of the soul, if you will communicate that knowledge to me, you will have discharged your debt to your instructor. Declare to me what acts are efficacious for the alleviation of human affliction."

NOTES

1. Both study of the Vedas (Svādhyāya) and abstraction (Yoga) are to be practised : when a man is weary of one, he may apply to the other. The Yoga, however, limits the practical part of silent prayer. जपाच्छ्रान्तः पुनर्ध्यायेद् ध्यानाच्छ्रान्तः पुनर्जपेत्। 'Wearied of meditation, let him pray inaudibly: weary of prayer, let him repeat meditation.' जपध्यानाभियोगेन पश्येदात्मानमात्मनि। 'By the union of prayer and meditation let him behold soul in himself.'

2. No such names occur amongst the Maithila kings of the Viṣṇu Purāṇa (see Bk. IV. Ch. V.); but, as there noticed (note 6), the Bhāgavata inserts them. Janaka is used as a title. Kṛtadhvaja, in some of the copies, is read Ritadhwaja.

3. The performance of rites as a means of salvation is called ignorance in the Vedas (see Bk. VI. Ch. V. n. 7). Works are recommended as introductory to the acquirement of knowledge: it is ignorance to consider them as finite.

4. Tasya-dhenum (तस्यधेनुं). Once copy has Homa-dhenu, 'cow of sacrifice;' another, Dharma-dhenu, 'cow of righteousness.' The commentator explains the terms as importing the same thing, a cow yielding milk for holy purposes, or for the butter which is poured in oblations upon the sacrificial fire.

सप्तमोऽध्यायः

(ब्रह्मयोगनिर्णयः)

केशिध्वज उवाच

"But," said Keśidhwaja, "why have you not asked of me my kingdom, now free from all annoyance? What else except dominion is acceptable to the warrior race?"

खाण्डिक्य उवाच

"I will tell you," replied Khāṇḍikya, "why I did not make such a demand, nor require that territory which is an object of ignorant ambition. It is the duty of the warrior to protect his subjects in peace, and to kill in fight the enemies of his sway. It is no fault that you should have taken my kingdom from one who was unable to defend it, to whom it was a bondage, and who was thus freed from the encumbrance of ignorance. My desire of dominion originated in my being born to possess it: the ambition of others, which proceeds from human frailties, is not compatible with virtue. To solicit gifts is not the duty of a prince and warrior: and for these reasons I have not asked for your kingdom, nor made a demand which ignorance alone would have suggested. Those only who are destitute of knowledge, whose minds are engrossed by selfishness, who are intoxicated with the inebriating beverage of self-sufficiency, desire kingdoms; not such as I am.

पराशर उवाच

प्रहृष्टः साध्विति प्राह ततः केशिध्वजो नृपः।
खाण्डिक्यजनकं प्रीत्या श्रूयतां वचनं मम॥ ८॥

When king Keśidhvaja heard these words, he was much pleased, and exclaimed, "It is well spoken!"

अहन्त्वविद्यामृत्युञ्च तर्त्तुकामः करोमि वै।
राज्यं यागांश्च विविधान् भोगैः पुण्यक्षयं तथा॥ ९॥

Then addressing Khāṇḍikya affectionately, he said, "Listen to my words. Through desire of escaping death by the ignorance of works I exercise the regal power, celebrate various sacrifices, and enjoy pleasures subversive of purity.

तदिदं ते मनो दिष्ट्या विवेकैश्वर्यतां गतम्।

अनात्मन्यात्मबुद्धिर्या अस्वे स्वमिति या मतिः।
अविद्यातरुसम्भूतेर्बीजमेतद् द्विधा स्थितम्॥ ११॥

Fortunate is it for you that your mind has attached itself to the dominion of discrimination. Pride of your race! now listen to the real nature of ignorance. The (erroneous) notion that self consists in what is not self, and the opinion that property consists in what is not one's own, constitute the double seed of the tree of ignorance.

पञ्चभूतात्मके देहे देही मोहतमोवृतः।

आकाश-वाय्वग्नि-जल-पृथिवीभ्यः पृथक् स्थिते।
आत्मन्यात्ममयं भावं कः करोति कलेवरे॥ १३॥

The ill-judging embodied being, bewildered by the darkness of fascination, situated in a body composed of the five elements, loudly asserts, 'This is I': but who would ascribe spiritual individuality to a body in which soul is distinct from the ether, air, fire, water, and earth (of which that body is composed?[1]

कलेवरोपभोग्यं हि गृहक्षेत्रादिकञ्च कः।
अदेहे ह्यात्मनि प्राज्ञो ममेदमिति मन्यते॥ १४॥
इत्यञ्च पुत्र-पौत्रेषु तद्देहोत्पादितेषु कः।
करोति पण्डितः स्वाम्यमनात्मनि कलेवरे॥ १५॥

What man of understanding assigns to disembodied spirit corporeal fruition, or lands, houses, and the like, that it should say, 'These are mine?' What wise man entertains the idea of property in sons or grandsons begotten of the body after the spirit has abandoned it?

सर्वं देहोपभोगाय कुरुते कर्म्म मानवः।
देहश्चान्यो यदा पुंसस्तदा बन्धाय तत्परम्॥ १६॥

Man performs all acts for purpose of bodily fruition, and the consequence of such acts is another body; so that their result is nothing but confinement to bodily existence.

पार्थिवोऽयं तथा देहो मृदन्नालेपनस्थितिः॥ १७॥

In the same manner as a mansion of clay is plastered with clay and water, so the body, which is of earth, is perpetuated by earth and water (or by eating and drinking).

पञ्चभूतात्मकैर्भोगैः पञ्चभूतात्मकं वपुः।
आप्यायते यदि ततः पुंसो गर्वोऽत्र किं ततः॥ १८॥
अनेकजन्मसाहस्रीं संसारपदवीं व्रजन्।
मोहश्रमं प्रयातोऽसौ वासनारेणुगुण्ठितः॥ १९॥

The body, consisting of the five elements, is nourished by substance equally composed of those elements; but since this is the case, what is there in this life that man should be proud of? Travelling the path of the world for many thousands of births, man attains only the weariness of bewilderment, and is smothered by the dust of imagination.

प्रक्षाल्यते यदा सोऽस्य रेणुर्ज्ञानोष्णवारिणा।
तदा संसारपान्थस्य याति मोहश्रमः शमम्॥ २०॥
मोहश्रमे शमं याते स्वस्थान्तः करणः पुमान्।

अनन्यातिशयाबाधं परं निर्वाणमृच्छति॥ २१॥

When that dust is washed away by the bland water of real knowledge, then the weariness of bewilderment sustained by the wayfarer through repeated births is removed. When that weariness is relieved, the internal man is at peace, and he obtains that supreme felicity which is unequalled and undisturbed.

निर्वाणमय एवायमात्मा ज्ञानमयोऽमलः।

जलस्य नाग्निसंसर्गः स्थालीसङ्गात्तथापि हि।
शब्दोद्रेकादिकान् धर्म्मांस्तत् करोति यथा मुने॥ २३॥

This soul is (of its own nature) pure, and composed of happiness and wisdom. The properties of pain, ignorance, and impurity, are those of nature (Prakṛti), not of soul. There is no affinity between fire and water, but when the latter is placed over the former in a caldron it bubbles and boils, and exhibits the properties of fire.

तथात्मा प्रकृतेः सङ्गादहम्मानादिदूषितः।
भजते प्राकृतान् धर्म्मानभ्यस्तेभ्यो हि सोऽव्ययः॥ २४॥
तदेतत् कथितं बीजमविद्यायास्तव प्रभो।
क्लेशानाञ्च क्षयकरं योगादन्यन्न विद्यते॥ २५॥

In like manner, when soul is associated with Prakṛti it is vitiated by egotism and the rest, and assumes the qualities of grosser nature, although essentially distinct from them, and incorruptible. Such is the seed of ignorance, as I have explained it to you. There is but one cure of worldly sorrows, the practice of devotion; no other is known."

खाण्डिक्य उवाच

विज्ञातयोगशास्त्रार्थस्त्वमस्यां निमिसन्ततौ॥ २६॥

"Then," said Khāṇḍikya, "do you, who are the chief of those versed in contemplative devotion, explain to me what that is; for in the race of the descendants of Nimi[2] you are best acquainted with the sacred writings in which it is taught."

केशिध्वज उवाच

योगस्वरूपं खाण्डिक्य! श्रूयतां गदतो मम।

मन एव मनुष्याणां कारणं बन्धमोक्षयोः।
बन्धाय विषयासङ्गि मुक्त्यै निर्विषयं तथा॥ २८॥

"Hear," replied Keśidhvaja, "the account of the nature of contemplative devotion[3], which I impart to you, and by perfection in which the sage attains resolution into Brahma, and never suffers birth again. The mind of man is the cause both of his bondage and his liberation: its addiction to the objects of sense is the means of his bondage; its separation from objects of sense is the means of his freedom.

आत्मभावं नयत्येनं तद्ब्रह्म ध्यायिनं मुनिम्।
विकार्यमात्मनः शक्त्या लोहमाकर्षको यथा॥ ३०॥

The sage who is capable of discriminative knowledge must therefore restrain his mind from all the objects of sense, and therewith meditate upon the supreme being, who is one with spirit, in order to attain liberation; for that supreme spirit attracts to itself him who meditates upon it, and who is of the same nature, as the load stone attracts the iron by the virtue which is common to itself and to its products[4].

एवमत्यन्तवैशिष्ट्ययुक्त कर्मोपलक्षणः।
यस्य योगस्य वै योगी मुमुक्षुरभिधीयते॥ ३२॥

Contemplative devotion is the union with Brahma, effected by that condition of mind which has attained perfection through those exercise which complete the control of self[5]: and he whose contemplative devotion is characterized by the property of such absolute perfection, is in truth a sage, expectant of final liberation from the world.

योगयुक् प्रथमं योगी युञ्जानो ह्यभिधीयते।

स्वाध्याय-शौच-सन्तोष-तपांसि नियतात्मवान्।
कुर्वीत ब्रह्मणि तथा परस्मिन् प्रवणं मनः॥ ३७॥

"The sage, or Yogi, when first applying himself to contemplative devotion is called the novice or practitioner (Yoga yuj); when he has attained spiritual union he is termed the adept, or he whose meditations are accomplished[6]. Should the thoughts of the former be unvitiated by any obstructing imperfection, he will obtain freedom, after practising devotion through several lives[7]. The latter speedily obtains liberation in that existence (in which he reaches perfection), all his acts being consumed by the fire of contemplative devotion. The sage who would bring his mind into a fit state for the performance of devout contemplation must be devoid of desire, and observe invariably continence, compassion, truth, honesty, and disinterestedness: he must fix his mind intently on the supreme Brahma, practising holy study, purification, contentment, penance and self-control.

एते यमाः सनियमाः पञ्च पञ्च प्रकीर्त्तिताः।

आलम्बनमनन्तस्य योगिनोऽभ्यसतः स्मृतम्॥ ४२॥

These virtues, respectively termed the five acts of restraint (Yama), and five of obligation (Niyama), bestow excellent rewards when practised for the sake of reward, and eternal liberation when they are not prompted by desire (of transient benefits). Endowed with these merits, the sage self-restrained should sit in one of the modes termed Bhadrāsana, etc., and engage in contemplation[8]. Bringing his vital airs, called Prāṇa, under subjection, by frequent repetition, is thence called Prāṇāyāma, which is as it were a seed with a seed[9]. In this the breath of expiration and that of inspiration are alternately obstructed, constituting the act twofold; and the suppression of both modes of breathing produces a third[10]. The exercise of the Yogi, whilst endeavouring to bring before his thoughts the gross form of the eternal, is denominated Ālambana[11].

इन्द्रियाणामवश्यैस्तैर्न योगी योगसाधकः॥ ४४॥

He is then to perform the Pratyāhāra, which consists in restraining his organs of sense from susceptibility to outward impressions, and directing them entirely to mental perceptions. By these means the entire subjugation of the unsteady senses is effected; and if they are not controlled, the sage will not accomplish his devotions.

प्राणायामेन पवनैः प्रत्याहारेण चेन्द्रियैः।
वशीकृतैस्ततः कुर्यात् स्थिरं चेतः शुभाश्रये॥ ४५॥

When by the Prāṇāyāma the vital airs are restrained, and the senses are subjugated by the Pratyāhāra, then the sage will be able to keep his mind steady in its perfect asylum."

खाण्डिक्य उवाच

कथ्यतां मे महाभाग! चेतसो यः शुभाश्रयः।
यदाधारमशेषं तद्धन्ति दोषसमुद्भवम्॥ ४६॥

Khāndikya then said to Keśidhvaja. "Illustrious sage, inform me what is that perfect asylum of the mind, resting on which it destroys all the products of (human) infirmity."

केशिध्वज उवाच

To this, Keśidhvaja replied: "The asylum of mind in spirit (Brahma), which of its own nature is twofold, as being with or without form; and each of these is supreme and secondary[12]. Apprehension of spirit[13], again, is threefold. I will explain the different kinds to you: they are, that which is called Brahma, that which is named from works, and that which comprehends both. The mental apprehension which consists of Brahma is one; that which is formed of works is another; and that which comprehends both is the third: so that mental apprehension (of the object or asylum of the thoughts) is threefold. Sanandana and other (perfect sages) were endowed with apprehension of the nature of Brahma. The gods and others, whether animate or inanimate, are possessed of that which regards acts.

The apprehension that comprehends both works and spirit exists in Hiraṇyagarbha and others, who are possessed of contemplative knowledge of their own nature, and who also exercise certain active functions, as creation and the rest. Until all acts, which are the causes of notions of individuality, are discontinued, spirit is one thing, and the universe of another, to those who contemplate objects distinct and various; but that is called true knowledge, or knowledge of Brahma, which recognises no distinctions, which contemplates only simple existence, which is indefinable by words, and is to be discovered solely in one's own spirit.

That is the supreme, imperishable form of Viṣṇu, who is without (sensible) form, and is characterised as a condition of the supreme soul, which is variously modified from the condition of universal form. But this condition cannot be contemplated by sages in their (early) devotions, and they must therefore direct their minds to the gross form of Hari, which is of universal perceptibility. They must meditate upon him as Hiraṇyagarbha, as the glorious Vāsava, as Prajāpati, as the winds, the Vasus, the Rudras, the suns, stars, planets, Gandharvas, Yakṣas, Daityas, all the gods and their progenitors, men, animals, mountains, oceans, rivers, trees, all beings, and all sources of beings, all modification whatever of nature and its products, whether sentient or unconscious, one-footed, two-footed, or many-footed; all these are the sensible form of Hari, to be apprehended by the three kinds of apprehension.

All this universal world, this world of moving and stationary beings, is pervaded by the energy of Viṣṇu, who is of the nature of the supreme Brahma. This energy is either supreme, or, when it is that of conscious embodied spirit, it is secondary. Ignorance, or that which is denominated from works, is a third energy;[14] by which the omnipresent energy of embodied spirit is ever excited, and whence it suffers all the pains of repeated worldly existence. Obscured by that energy (of ignorance or illusion), the energy that is denominated from embodied spirit is characterised by different degrees of perfection in all created beings.

In things without life it exists in a very small degree: it is more in things that have life, but are (without motion): in insects it is still more abundant, and still more in birds; it is more in wild animals, and in domestic animals the faculty is still greater: men have more of this (spiritual) faculty than animals, and thence arises their authority over them: the faculty exists in an ascending degree in Nāgas, Gandharvas, Yakṣas, gods, Śakra, Prajāpati, and Hiraṇyagarbha: and is above all predominant in that male (Viṣṇu) of whom all these various creatures are but the diversified forms, penetrated universally by his energy, as all-pervading as the ether.

"The second[15] state of him who is called Viṣṇu, and which is to be meditated upon by the (advanced) sage, is that imperceptible, shapeless form of Brahma, which is called by the wise, 'That which is[16], and in which all the before described energies reside. Thence proceeds the form of the universal form, the other great form of Hari, which is the origin of those manifested forms (or incarnations) that are endowed with every kind of energy, and which, whether the forms of gods, animals, or men, are assumed by him (Hari) in his sport. This active interposition of the indefinable god, all-comprehending and irresistible, is for the purpose of benefiting the world, and is not the necessary consequence of works.

This form of the universal form is to be meditated upon by the sage for the object of purification, as it destroys all sin. In the same manner as fire, blazing in the wind, burns dry grass, so Viṣṇu, seated in the heart, consumes the sins of the sage; and therefore let him resolutely effect the fixation of his mind upon that receptacle of all the three energies (Viṣ ṇu), for that is the operation of the mind which is called perfect Dhāranā:[17] and thus the perfect asylum of individual as well as universal spirit, that which is beyond the three modes of apprehension, is attained, for the eternal emancipation of the sage.

The minds of other beings, which are not fixed upon that asylum, are altogether impure, and are all the gods and the rest, who spring from acts. The retention or apprehension by the mind of that visible form of Viṣṇu, without regard to subsidiary forms, is thence called Dhāranā; and I will describe to you the perceptible form of Hari, which no mental retention will manifest, except in a mind that is fit to become the receptacle of the idea.[18]

The meditating sage must think (he beholds internally the figure) of Viṣṇu as having a pleased and lovely countenance, with eyes like the leaf of the lotus, smooth cheeks, and a broad and brilliant forehead; ears of equal size, the lobes of which are decorated with splendid pendants; a painted neck, and a broad breast, on which shines the Śrīvatsa mark; a belly falling in graceful folds, with a deep-seated navel; eight long arms, or else four; and firm and well-knit thighs and legs, with well-formed feet and toes.

शार्ङ्ग-शङ्ख-गदा-खड्ग-चक्राक्षबलयान्वितम्॥८३॥

Let him, with well-governed thoughts, contemplate, as long as he can persevere in unremitting attention, Hari as clad in a yellow robe, wearing a rich diadem on his head, and brilliant armlets and bracelets on his arms, and bearing in his hands the bow, the shell, the mace, the sword, the discus, the rosary, the lotus, and the arrow[19].

चिन्तयेद्भगवद्रूपं प्रशान्तं साक्षसूत्रकम्॥८६॥

When this image never departs from his mind, whether he be going or standing, or be engaged in any other voluntary act, then he may believe his retention to be perfect. The sage may then meditate upon the form of Viṣ ṇu without his arms, as the shell, mace, discus, and bow; and as placid, and bearing only his rosary.

When the idea of this image is firmly retained, then he may meditate on Viṣṇu without his diadem, bracelets, or other ornaments. He may next contemplate him as having but one single limb, and may then fix his whole thoughts upon the body to which the limbs belong. This process of forming a lively image in the mind, exclusive of all other objects, constitutes Dhyāna, or meditation, which is perfected by six stages:[20] and when an accurate knowledge of self, free from all distinction, is attained by this mental meditation, that is termed Samādhi.[21]

"(When the Yogi has accomplished this stage, he acquires) discriminative knowledge, which is the means of enabling living soul, when all the three kinds of apprehension are destroyed, to attain the attainable supreme Brahma[22]. Embodied spirit is the user of the instrument, which instrument is true knowledge; and by it that (identification) of the former (with Brahma) is attained[23]. Liberation, which is the object to be effected, being accomplished, discriminative knowledge ceases. When endowed with the apprehension of the nature of the object of inquiry, then, there is no difference between it (individual and) supreme spirit: difference is the consequence of the absence of (true) knowledge. When that ignorance which is the cause of the difference between individual and universal spirit is destroyed finally and for ever, who shall ever make that distinction between them which does not exist? Thus have I, Khāṇḍikya, in reply to your question, explained to you what is meant by contemplative devotion, both fully and summarily. What else do you wish to hear?"

Khāṇāhikya replied to Keśidhvaja, and said, "The explanation which you have given me of the real nature of contemplative devotion has fulfilled all my wishes, and removed all impurity from my mind. The expression 'mine,' which I have been accustomed to use, is untruth, and cannot be otherwise declared by those who know what is to be known. The words 'I' and 'mine' constitute ignorance; but practice is influenced by ignorance. Supreme truth cannot be defined, for it is not to be explained by words. Depart therefore, Keśidhvaja; you have done all that is necessary for my real happiness, in teaching me contemplative devotion, the inexhaustible bestower of liberation from existence."

Accordingly king Keśidhvaja, after receiving suitable homage from Khāṇḍikya, returned to his city. Khāṇḍikya, having nominated his son Rājā[24], retired to the woods to accomplish his devotions, his whole mind being intent upon Govinda: there his entire thoughts being engrossed upon one only object, and being purified by practices of restraint, self-control, and the rest, he obtained absorption into the pure and perfect spirit which is termed Viṣṇu. Keśidhvaja also, in order to attain liberation, became averse from his own perishable works, and lived amidst objects of sense (without regarding them,) and instituted religious rites without expecting therefrom any advantages to himself. Thus by pure and auspicious fruition, being cleansed from all sin, he also obtained that perfection which assuages all affliction for ever.

NOTES

1. The text is somewhat obscure, but it is in some degree cleared up by the illustration. No one would think of applying the property of self– the idea of possession or personality– to soul, separated from body: but the objection is equally applicable to soul in the body; for whilst there it is as distinct in its nature from the materials of body as if it was disembodied, and quite as incapable of individual personal fruition.

2. That is, in the race of princes of Mithilā.

3. The term Yoga (योगः), which is that used in the text, in its literal acceptation signifies 'union', 'junction' from युज 'to join:' in a spiritual sense it denotes 'union of separated with universal soul;' and with some latitude of expression it comes to signify the means by which such union is effected. In the Bhagavad Gītā it is variously applied, but ordinarily denotes the performance of religious ceremonies as a duty, and not for interested purposes. Thus Kṛṣṇa says to Arjuna, योगस्थः कुरु कर्माणि संगं त्यक्त्वा धनंजय सिद्धासिद्धो समोभूत्वा समत्वं योग उच्यते। "Engaging in Yoga, perform rites, Dhanañjaya, being indifferent to success or failure: such indifferences is called Yoga." II. v. 48. It is elsewhere defined, 'exemption from the contact of pain:' दुःखसंयोग वियोगं योगसंज्ञितं। VI. v. 23. The word has been accordingly rendered 'devotion' by Wilkins, and 'devotio' by Schlegel, in their translations of the Gītā. In this place, however, it is used in a less general sense, and signifies, as is subsequently explained, reunion with spirit through the exercises necessary to perfect abstruction as they are taught and practised by the followers of Patañjali.

4. This illustration is however only to a limited extent, explanatory of the nature of Yoga; for though the loadstone and iron unite, by virtue of a community of kind, yet the union that takes place is only that of contiguity, Saṁyoga (संयोग), not that of identification or unity. Tadaikyam (तदैक्यं). Some further explanation therefore is required.

5. The first stage is the Ātma prayatna, the practice of moral and religious restraint, Yama, Niyama, &c. When the novice is perfect in these, then he is fit to attain the perfectibility of an adept, through the especial practices which treatises on the Yoga prescribe. When the mind has attained the state which can alone be attained through them, then the union with Brahma, which is the consequence, is called Yoga: आत्मप्रयत्नसापेक्षाविशिष्टाया मनोगतिः। तस्या ब्रह्मणि संयोगो योग इत्यभिधीयते॥ The Ātma prayatna is defined to be that which has Yama, &c. for its objects, यमनियमादिविषयः। The next phrase, तत्सापेक्षा, is explained तदधीना 'depending upon, or relating to, such control.' मनोगति is the same as मनोवृत्ति condition or state of mind which is विशिष्टा perfected: of that state of mind, union with Brahma, is Yoga. Union with Brahma is the abstraction that proposes the identity of the living with the supreme spirit of the Jīvātma, with Brahma; जीवात्मब्रह्मैक्यविषयत्वं। and Yoga is understanding of the identity of the contemplator and the object contemplated; ध्यातृध्येयैक्यधीः। A text of Yājñavalkya is quoted to this effect: ज्ञानं योगात्मकं विद्धि योऽष्टाष्टाङ्गसंयुतः संयोगो योग इत्युक्तो जीवात्मपरमात्मनोः। 'Know holy wisdom to be the same with Yoga' (the practice of) which has eight divisions. That which is termed Yoga is union of the living with the supreme soul.'

6. Viniṣpannasamādhi is the expression of the text, which can scarcely be regarded an appellative. The commentator terms the adept Brahmajñānin, 'He who knows Brahma.'

7. After three lives, according to the Vāyu Sanhitā, as quoted in the comment.

8. Thcre are various postures in which the Yogi is directed to sit when he engages in meditation. In the Bhadrāsana he is directed to cross his legs underneath him, and to lay hold of his feet on each side with his hands.

9. सवीजो बीज एवच। It is itself figuratively the seeds of the fruit, which is meditation; but it is to be accompanied with what is also technically called Bīja, or seed, inaudible repetition of certain prayers, and meditation on the visible form of the deity, termed likewise Ālambana, and presently mentioned.

10. Prāṇāyāma is performed by three modifications of breathing: the first act is expiration, which is performed through the right nostril, whilst the left is closed with the fingers of the right hand; this is called Rechaka; the thumb is then placed upon the right nostril, and the fingers raised from the left, through which breath is inhaled; this is called Pūraka; in the third act both nostrils are closed, and breathing suspended; this is Kumbhaka; and a succession of these operations is the practice of Prāṇāyāma.

11. Ālambana is the silent repetition of prayer.

12. आश्रयश्चेतसो ब्रह्म द्विधा तच्च स्वरूपता। भूप मूर्तममूर्तं च परं चारमेव च।। The Brahma that is without form (Amūrtta) may be Para or Apara. Supreme formless spirit is without attributes of any kind. Secondary formless spirit is invested with the attributes of power, glory, truth, perfection. Spirit embodied, or with form in his highest state, is, according to out text, Viṣṇu and his manifestations. Spirit in an inferior or secondary series of bodily forms is Brahmā and all other living beings.

13. The term is Bhāvanā, defined to be, 'function to be engendered by knowledge;' ज्ञानजन्य: संस्कार:। the mental impression of apprehension following upon knowledge. Here it implies in particular the formation of a fixed idea by the Yogi of the object of his contemplations. It is also termed Bhāva-bhāvaṇa, 'apprehension of the being, the existence, or substantiality, of the objects; the thing contemplated:' भावो वस्तु तद्विषया भावना भावभावना।

14. The term used throughout is Śakti (शक्ति), 'power,' 'ability,' 'energy.' By the first kind, or Parā, is understood knowledge able to appreciate abstract truth, or the nature of universal soul; by the second, ability to understand the nature of embodied soul; and by the third, inability to discern one's own nature, and reliance on moral or ceremonial merit. These different kinds are called energies, because they are the energies or faculties of the supreme spirit, or according to the Vaiṣ ṇavas, of Viṣṇu, accompanying soul in all its various conditions of existence.

15. The first, which has been intended to be described in the foregoing passages, was the universal, visible form of Viṣṇu; the second is his formless or imperceptible condition.

16. Sat (सत्), 'what is being.'

17. Retention, or holding of the image or idea formed in the mind by contemplation: from Dhṛ (धृ), 'to hold,' literally or figuratively.

18. The explanation of Dhāraṇā given in the text is rendered unnecessarily perplexed by the double doctrine here taught, and the attempt to combine the abstraction of Yoga theism with the sectarian worship of Viṣṇu.

19. The two last implements are from the comment; the text specifies only six.

20. They are, 1. Yama &c., acts of restraint and obligation; 2. Āsana, sitting in particular postures; 3. Praṇāyāma, modes of breathing; 4. Pratyāhāra, exclusion of all external ideas; 5. Bhāvanā, apprehension of internal ideas; 6. Dhāranā, fixation or retention of those ideas.

21. The result of the Dhyāna or Samādhi is the absence of all idea of individuality, when the meditator, the meditation, and the thing or object meditated upon, are all considered to be but one. According to the text of Patañjali: 'Restraint of the body, retention of the mind, and meditation, which thence is exclusively confined to one object, is Dhyāna: the idea of identification with the object of such meditation, so as if devoid of individual nature, is Samādhi;' देहवन्धश्चित्त धारणा तत्प्रत्ययैकता नता ध्यानं। तदैकार्थमात्रनिर्भासं स्वरूपशून्यमिव समाधि:।।

22. The expressions of the text are somewhat obscure, nor does the commentator make them much more intelligible, until he cuts the matter short by stating the meaning to be, that 'discriminative knowledge enables the living spirit to attain Brahma': विज्ञानं जीवात्मानं ब्रह्म प्रापयतीत्यर्थ:।

23. The text is very elliptical and obscure. Having stated that embodied spirit (Kṣetrajña) is the Kakraṇin, the possessor or user of the Karaṇa, which is knowledge, it adds, तेन तस्य तत्। literally, 'by that, of that, that;' i.e. Tat, 'that which is;' and Brahma, or supreme spirit, is the attainment of that spirit which abides in body by that instrument, or discriminative knowledge, of which it has become possessed through perfect meditation: क्षेत्रज्ञः करणी ज्ञानं करणं तेन तस्य तत्। निष्याद्य मुक्तिं कार्य्यं कृत कृत्यान्निवर्त्तते।। विज्ञानं निवर्त्तते।।

24. The commentator, in order to explain how Khāṇḍikya should have given what he did not possess, states that it is to be understood that Keśidhvaja relinquished to him the kingdom; or the term Rājā may denote merely, master of, or acquainted with, mystic prayers, or Mantras: यद्वा राजानं मन्त्रस्वामिनं कृत्वा।

Parāśara said– I have now explained to you, Maitreya, the third kind of worldly dissolution, or that which is absolute and final, which is, liberation and resolution into eternal spirit[1]. I have related to you primary and secondary creation, the families of the patriarchs, the periods of the Manvantaras, and the genealogical histories (of the kings). I have repeated to you, in short, who were desirous of hearing it, the imperishable Vaishṇava Purāṇa, which is destructive of all sins, the most excellent of all holy writings, and the means of attaining the great end of man. If there is any thing else you wish to hear, propose your question, and I will answer it.

Maitreya said– Holy teacher, you have indeed related to me all that I wished to know, and I have listened to it with pious attention. I have nothing further to inquire. The doubts inseparable from the mind of man have all been resolved by you, and through your instructions I am acquainted with the origin, duration, and end of all things; with Viṣṇu in his collective fourfold form[2]; his three energies[3]; and with the three modes of apprehending the object of contemplation[4]. Of all this have I acquired a knowledge through your favour, and nothing else is worthy to be known, when it is once understood that Viṣṇu and this world are not mutually distinct.

O Great Muni, I have obtained through your kindness all I desired, the dissipation of my doubts, since you have instructed me in the duties of the several tribes, and in other obligations; the nature of active life, and discontinuance of action; and the derivation of all that exists from works. There is nothing else, venerable Brahman, that I have to inquire of you; and forgive me if your answer to my questions have imposed upon you any fatigue. Pardon me the trouble that I have given you, through that amiable quality of the virtuous which makes no distinction between a disciple and a child.

Parāśara said– I have related to you this Purāṇa, which is equal to the Vedas in sanctity, and by hearing which all faults and sins whatever are expiated. In this have been described to you the primary and secondary creation, the families of the patriarchs, the Manvantaras, the regal dynasties; the gods, Daityas, Gandharvas, serpents, Rākṣasas, Yakṣ as, Vidyādharas, Siddhas, and heavenly nymphs; Munis endowed with spiritual wisdom, and practisess of devotion; the distinction of the four castes, and the actions of the most eminent amongst men; holy places on the earth, holy rivers and oceans, sacred mountains, and legends of the truly wise; the duties of the different tribes, and the observances enjoined by the Vedas. By hearing this, all sins are at once obliterated.

In this also the glorious Hari has been revealed, the cause of the creation, preservation, and destruction of the world; the soul of all things, and himself all things: by the repetition of whose name man is undoubtedly liberated from all sins, which fly like wolves that are frightened by a lion.

The repetition of his name with devout faith is the best remover of all sins, destroying them as fire purifies the metal from the dross. The stain of the Kali age, which ensures to men sharp punishments in hell, is at once effacted by a single invocation of Hari. He who is all that is, the whole egg of Brahma, which Hiraṇyagarbha, Indra, Rudra, the Ādityas, the Asvins, the winds, the Kinnaras, the Vasus, the Sādhyas, Viśvadevas, the celestial gods, the Yakṣas, serpents, Rākṣasas, the Siddhas, Daityas, Gandharvas, Dānavas, nymphs, the stars, asterisms, planets, the seven Ṛṣis, the regents and superintendents of the quarters, men, Brāhmaṇas and the rest, animals tame and wild, insects, birds, ghosts, and goblins, trees, mountains, woods, rivers, oceans, the subterrene legions, the division of the earth, and all perceptible objects– he who is all things, who knows all things, who is the form of all things, being without form himself, and of whom whatever is, from mount Meru to an atom, all consists– he, the glorious Viṣṇu, the destroyer of all sin– is described in this Purāṇa.

प्रयागे पुष्करे चैव कुरुक्षेत्रे तथार्बुदे।
कृतोपवासः प्राप्नोति तदस्य श्रवणान्नरः॥ २९॥

By hearing this Purāṇa an equal recompense is obtained to that which is derived from the performance of an Aśvamedha sacrifice, or from fasting at the holy places Prayāga, Puṣkara Kurukṣetra, or Arbuda.

यदग्निहोत्रे सुहुते वर्षेणाप्नोति वै फलम्।

Hearing this Puraṇa but once is as efficacious as the offering of oblations in a perpetual fire for a year. The man who with well-governed passions bathes at Mathurā on the twelfth day of the month Jyeṣṭha[5], and beholds (the image of) Hari, obtains a great recompense; so does he who with mind fixed upon Keśava attentively recites this Purāṇa.

The man who bathes in the waters of the Yamunā on the twelfth lunation of the light fortnight of the month in which the moon is in the mansion Jyeṣṭhā, and who fasts and worships Acyuta in the city of Mathurā, receives the reward of an uninterrupted Aśvamedha.

परामृद्धिमवाप्स्यामस्तारिताः स्वकुलोद्भवैः॥ ३७॥

Beholding the degree of prosperity enjoyed by others of eminence, through the merits of the descendants, a man's paternal ancestors, his parents and their parents exclaim, "Whosoever of our descendants, having bathed in the Yamunā and fasted, will worship Govinda in Mathurā, in the light fortnight of Jyeṣṭha, will secure for us eminent exaltation: for we shall be elevated by the merits of our posterity!"

ज्येष्ठामूले सिते पक्षे समभ्यर्च्य जनार्द्दनम्।
धन्यानां कुलजः पिण्डान् यमुनायां प्रदास्यति॥ ३८॥

A man of good extraction will present obsequial cakes to his fortunate ancestors in the Yamunā, having worshipped Janārdana in the light fortnight of Jyeṣṭha.

तस्मिन् काले समभ्यर्च्य तत्र कृष्णं समाहितः।

एतत् संसारभीरूणां परित्राणमनुत्तमम्।

But the same degree of merit that a man reaps from adoring Janārddana at the season with a devoted heart, and from bathing in the Yamunā, and effecting the liberation of his progenitors by offering to them on such an occasion obsequial cakes, he derives also from hearing with equal devotion a section of this Purāṇa. This Purāṇa is the best of all preservatives for those who are afraid of worldly existence, a certain alleviation of the sufferings of men, and remover of all imperfections.

This Purāṇa, originally composed by the Ṛṣi (Nārāyaṇa), was communicated by Brahmā to Ṛbhu; he related it to Priyavrata, by whom it was imparted to Bhāguri. Bhāguri recited it to Tamasitra[6], and he to Dadīca, who gave it to Sārasvata. From the last Bhṛgu received it, who imparted it to Dhṛtarāṣṭra the Nāga king, and to Purāṇa of the same race, by whom it was repeated to their monarch Vāsuki. Vāsuki communicated it to Vatsa, and he to Aśvatara, from whom it successively proceeded to Kambala and Elapatra. When the Muni Vedaśiras descended to Pātāla, he there received the whole Purāṇa from these Nāgas, and communicated it to Pramati. Pramati consigned it to the wise Jātukarṇa, and he taught it to many other holy persons. Through the blessings of Vasiṣṭha it came to my knowledge, and I have now, Maitreya, faithfully imparted it to you. You will teach it, at the end of the Kali age, so Śamīka[7].

पितृपक्षमनुष्येभ्यः समस्तामरसंस्तुतिः।
कृता तेन भवेदेतद् यः शृणोति दिने दिने॥५१॥
कपिलादानजनितं पुण्यमत्यन्तदुर्लभम्।
श्रुत्वैतस्य दशाध्यायानवाप्नोति न संशयः॥५२॥

Whoever hears this great mystery, which removes the contamination of the Kali, shall be freed from all his sins. He who hears this everyday acquits himself of his daily obligations to ancestors, gods and men. The great and rarely attainable merit that a man acquires by the gift of a brown cow, he derives from hearing ten chapters of this Purāṇa[8].

यस्त्वेतत् सकलं शृणोति पुरुषः कृत्वा मनस्यच्युतं, सर्वं सर्वमयं समस्तजगता माधारमात्माश्रयम्।
ज्ञानं ज्ञेयमनन्तमाद्यरहितं सर्वामराणां हितं
स प्राप्नोति न संशयोऽस्त्यविकलं यद्वाजिमेधे फलम्॥५३

He who hears the entire Purāṇa, contemplating in his mind Achyuta, who is all things, and of whom all things are made; who is the stay of the whole world, the receptacle of spirit; who is knowledge, and that which is to be known; who is without beginning or end, and the benefactor of the gods– obtains assuredly the reward that attends the uninterrupted celebration of the Aśvamedha rite.

यत्रादौ भगवांश्चराचरगुरु मध्ये तथान्ते च सः,
ब्रह्मज्ञानमयोच्युतोऽखिलजगन्मध्यान्तसर्गप्रभुः।
तच्छृण्वन् पुरुषः पवित्रपरमं भक्त्या पठन् धारयन्,
प्राप्नोत्यस्ति न तत् समस्तभुवनेष्वेकान्तसिद्धिर्हरिः॥५४॥

He who reads and retains with faith this Purāṇa in the beginning, middle, and end of which is described the glorious Achyuta, the lord of the universe in every stage, the master of all that is stationary or moveable, composed of spiritual knowledge, acquires such purity as exists not in any world, the eternal state of perfection, which is Hari.

यस्मिन्न्यस्तमतिर्न याति नरकं स्वर्गोऽपि यच्चिन्तने,
विघ्नो यत्र निवेशितात्ममनसो ब्राह्मोऽपि लोकोऽल्पकः।

मुक्तिं चेतसि यः स्थितोऽमलधियां पुंसा ददात्यव्ययः,
किं चित्रं यदघं प्रयाति विलयं तत्राच्युते कीर्त्तिते॥५५॥

The man who fixes his mind of Viṣṇu goes not to hell: he who meditates upon him regards heavenly enjoyment only as an impediment: and he whose mind and soul are penetrated by him thinks little of the world of Brahmā; for when present in the minds of those whose intellects are free from soil, he confers upon them eternal freedom. What marvel therefore is it that the sins of one who repeats the name of Achyuta should be wiped away?

यं यं ब्रह्ममयं परापरमयं ध्यायन्ति च ज्ञानिनः।
यञ्च प्राप्य न जायते न म्रियते नो वर्द्धते हीयते,
नैवासन्न च सद्भवत्यति ततः किं वा हरेः श्रूयताम्॥५६॥
कव्यं यः पितृरूपधृग् विधिहुतं हव्यञ्च भुङ्क्ते प्रभु।
र्देवत्वे भगवाननादिनिधनः स्वाहास्वधासंज्ञितम्।
यस्मिन् ब्रह्मणि सर्वशक्तिनिलये मानानि नो मानिनाम्,
निष्ठायै प्रभवन्ति हन्ति कलुषं श्रोत्रं स यातो हरिः ॥५७॥

Should not that Hari be heard of, whom those devoted to acts worship with sacrifices continually as god of sacrifice; whom those devoted to meditation contemplate as primary and secondary, composed of spirit; by obtaining whom man is not born, nor nourished, nor subjected to death ; who is all that is, and that is not (or both cause and effect); who, as the progenitors, receives the libations made to them; who as the gods, accepts the offerings addressed to them; the glorious being who is without beginning or end; whose name is both Svāhā and Svadhā[9]; who is the abode of all spiritual power; in whom the limits of finite things cannot be measured[10]; and who, when he enters the ear, destroys all sin? who is substance that knows not change.

नान्तोऽस्ति यस्य न च यस्य समुद्भवोऽस्ति
वृद्धिर्न यस्य परिणामविवर्ज्जितस्य।
नापक्षयञ्च समुपैत्यविकल्पवस्तु,
यस्तं नतोऽस्मि पुरुषोत्तममाद्यमीशम्॥५८॥

I adore that ever inexhaustible spirit, who assumed sensible qualities; who, though one, became many; who, though pure, became as if impure, by appearing in many and various shapes; who is endowed with divine wisdom, and is the author of the preservation of all creatures.

तस्यैव योऽनुगुणभुग् बहुधैक एव,
शुद्धोऽप्यशुद्ध इव मूर्त्तिविभागभेदैः।
ज्ञानान्वितः सकलसत्त्वविभूतिकर्त्ता
तस्मै नतोऽस्मि पुरुषाय सदाव्ययाय॥५९॥

I adore him, who is the one conjoined essence and object of both meditative wisdom and active virtue; who is watchful in providing for human enjoyments; who is one with the three qualities; who, without undergoing change, is the cause of the evolution of the world; who exists of his own essence, ever exempt from decay.

ज्ञानप्रवृत्तिनियमैक्यमयाय पुंसो
भोगप्रदानपटवे त्रिगुणात्मकाय।
अव्याकृताय भवभावनकारणाय वन्दे
स्वरूपमभवाय सदाजराय॥६०॥
व्योमानिलाग्निजलभूरचनामयाय
शब्दादिभोगविषययोपनयक्षमाय।
पुंसः समस्तकरणैरुपकारकाय
व्यक्ताय सूक्ष्मविमलाय सदा नतोऽस्मि॥६१॥

I constantly adore him, who is entitled heaven, air, fire, water, earth, and ether; who is the bestower of all the objects which give gratification to the senses; who benefits mankind with the instruments of fruition; who is perceptible, who is subtile, who is imperceptible.

इति विविधमजस्य यस्य रूपं
प्रकृतिपरात्ममयं सनातनस्य।
प्रदिशतु भगवानशेषपुंसां
हरिरपजन्मजरादिकां स सिद्धिम्॥६२॥

इति श्रीविष्णुपुराणे षष्ठांशे अष्टमः अध्यायः॥

May that unborn, eternal Hari, whose form is manifold, and whose essence is composed of both nature and spirit, bestow upon all mankind that blessed state which knows neither birth nor decay!

NOTES

1. The term is Brahmāṇi layaḥ (ब्रह्मणि लयः), which means, 'a melting away,' 'a dissolution' or 'fusion,' from the root Li (ली), 'to liquefy,' 'to melt,' 'to dissolve.

2. Or with Viṣṇu in the four modifications described in the first section, spirit, matter, form, and time: see Bk. I. Ch. II.

3. Or Śakti, noticed in the last chapter Ch. VII.

4. Or Bhāvaṇās, also described in the preceding section, Ch. VII.

5. This month is also called Jyeṣṭhamūla, which the commentator explains to mean, the month, of which the root or cause (Mūla) of being so called is the moon's being full in the constellation Jyeṣṭhā: but it may be so termed, perhaps, from the lunar asterism Mūlā, which is next to Jyeṣṭhā, falling also within the moon's passage through the same month.

6. This name is also read Tambamitra. One copy has Tava-mitrāya, 'to thy friend,' as if it was an epithet of Dadhīcha; but the construction of the verse requires a proper name. 'Bhāguri' gave it to Tambamitra, and he to Dadhīci:' भागुरिस्तंबमित्राय दधीचाय स चोक्तवान्।

7. A different series of narrators has been specified in the first book, Bk. I. Ch. I.

8. This seems to be an injudicious interpolation; it is not in all the copies.

9. The words or prayers employed in presenting oblations with fire.

10. The text has, यस्मिन् मानानि नो मानिनां निष्ठायै प्रभवन्ति। Māna commonly means 'pride,' but here it seems most appropriately rendered by its radical import 'measure:' the measures which are for the determination of measurable things are not applicable to Viṣṇu.
